Sunday is Bible Society Sunday and all three ministers will speak in the interests of that society.

WANTED

The town council are making arrangements to quarter the volunteers who are mobilizing here, in the new school building and will require a large number of mattresses, stretchers, or camp beds. Any parties having any of the above mentioned articles are requested to hand their names to Mayor Lippert at once.

H. S. HOCKEY CLUB

The organization meeting of the High School Hockey Club was held on Friday last, the following officers being elected:—

Hon. Pres.	Mr. J. Morgan
President	V. McKechnie
Sec'y Treas.	G. Pinkerton
Manager	J. Rowland
Captain	C. R. Skelton

The school has some excellent material this year and should be able to give a good account of themselves. The management have engaged the rink for three practices a week.

ASSAULTED FARMER

Because Wm Pollick, a farmer of Kincardine township sold a team of horses to a Paisley buyer after having promised to sell them to him on Saturday last a Ripley horse dealer became so incensed that he assaulted him and gave him a bad beating. The horse buyer later, without appearing in court paid a fine of $10.00 and costs. It is said that Pollick's injuries were such that it was necessary for him to be taken to the Kincardine hospital

HAND CAUGHT IN PRESS.

While engaged in running the small press in this office on Friday morning last Ed. Bowman had the misfortune to have his right hand caught in the machine. Two of the envelopes which Ed was running fell into the machinery and in endeavoring to recover them his hand was caught. Fortunately the drive shaft of the press broke which stopped the machine and prevented a more serious accident. As it was his hand was badly squeezed and he will be off work for some time.

Seven of the volunteers who have been doing guard-duty at the wireless station at Tobermory since the outbreak of the war have signed up with the third contingent and the following local youths left on Wednesday morning to take their place at the "Tub":—Jack Jackson, Ed. O'Brecht, Levi Miller, Harry Leech, Vic Brislan, Milton McCarter and Chester Cunningham. Among the local boys who are returning from Tobermory to join the third contingent are Joe Wallace and Robt. Turner but we have been unable to secure the names of the remaining five.

DEATH OF AGED RESIDENT

Mrs. Rae who for some time has been considered to be Walkerton's oldest citizen passed away at her home on the Mildmay road on Friday last after a lengthy illness. Although the correct age of the deceased could not be ascertained it was said she was at least ninety-five years of age. The late Mrs. Rae was a native of Ireland and came to Canada in 1848 and has been a resident of Walkerton for many years. The husband of the deceased who predeceased her by some twenty-eight years was a railroad contractor and assisted in building the Stratford-Goderich line and also the Guelph-Southampton line. The funeral took place to the Walkerton cemetery on Monday. She is survived by an adopted daughter, Miss Tillie Shelton.

$10 AND COSTS.

On an information laid against him by license Inspector White, Mr. J. Aecker of Carrick appeared before Magistrate Tolton on Friday, charged with procuring liquor while on the prohibitary list. He was found guilty and assessed $10.00 and costs, amounting in all to $15.50. In giving evidence, Becker informed the court that he had secured his liquor at a Neustadt hotel and although that village is out of his district, Mr. White is investigating the case and a charge against the hotelkeeper will probably be laid. As the license Inspector for that section of Grey resides in a distant part of the county it is claimed that the hotel-keepers in Neustadt and surrounding country pay little or no heed the laws governing the sale of booze.

ILLUSTRATED LECTURE

A lecture, magnificently illustrated by stereoptican views, will be delivered on Wednesday January 27th at 8 p.m. in the Town Hall, by Mr. Herbert B. Ames M. P., Honorary Secy. of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, for the benefit of the fund for the support of the wives and dependents of the volunteers who have enlisted to go to the front. The lecture will describe the composition, organization and distribution of the British Navy, a subject of which the lecturer made a special study in the autumn of 1913 in England and continental Europe. Everyone desirous of intelligently following the great naval campaign of the North Sea, the Mediterranean and the high seas, should hear this address. Admission to all parts of the Hall 25c The services of the lecturer are given free

SALE OF HATS

Violet, plush, velour and beaver shapes, on sale at 50c. to $1.00.—Miss L. Portcous, milliner.

GASHED HAND

RECRUITS FOR THIRD

The enlisting of recruits for the third contingent is in progress at the armoury under the supervision of Lieut Col. Douglass. Up to Wednesday afternoon twenty-one men had taken the oath as follows:—

W C Winters	Walkerton
W Fitzell	Bervie
Jack Frost	Chesley
S B Carter	"
Fred Jewell	Walkerton
Louis Runstadtler	"
Richard Addley	"
Norman Denny	"
Philip Denny	"
George Mann	Teeswater
J C Connell	"
A N Culham	Paisley
Thos Babcock	"
Harry Henry	"
C R Kemp	Chesley
Harry Duplock	"
James Steel	"
Douglas Jay	"
Bert Pavlin	"
J C Ostrom	Bervie
Wm Fraser	Kincardine

This is but a small percentage of the number of men who are expected to represent the 32nd in this force as 125 are required from Bruce county. Col. Douglas is very anxious that the full quota of men be secured and every youth or man who is in a position to do so is urged to answer the call to the colors of his king and country. The volunteers who enlist in Walkerton will be trained here until January 25th when they will be transferred to a concentration camp at Guelph. In the meantime the new school building will be used as a barracks and the volunteers will be quartered there.

REMANDED FOR A WEEK

On Wednesday evening last Chief Ferguson arrested an elderly gentleman, by the name of Cumberland, who apparently hailed from the vicinity of Orangeville,on a charge of fraudulently obtaining money for the Patriotic Fund. Cumberland, who was, it is claimed, in an intoxicated condition was soliciting contributions for this cause from the merchants in the western part of the town and as the genuineness of his credentials was questioned, word was sent to Mr. Ferguson, who placed him under arrest. At his trial on Friday it transpired that the prisoner had given the name of McDonald in one instance and when accosted by the Chief had given another fictitious name, while in his supposed credentials, the name of Cumberland appears. It was proven that he was soliciting money, but on no occasion so far as can be learned had he been given any. However, the attempt at fraud was proven, and unless the case takes an unlooked for turn a conviction will necessarily result. The prisoner was remanded for one week in order that the court might learn something of his past history, prior to proceeding with the case against him. He will appear for hearing before Magistrate Tolton on Friday at 10 a.m. The seriousness of the offence of which Cumberland is charged might be judged from the fact that recently a man in Barrie arrested on a similar charge, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to two years in Kingston penitentiary.

ANOTHER G. T. R. CHANGE

Since the recent change in their time-table the Grand Trunk have received compliments from many branches of their road stating that the service under the new time was very unsatisfactory. The local line was one of those on which the change had an undesirable effect and many complaints were registered. Considering this the company have decided to make another change to take effect on January 17th, which will in some degree remedy the cause of the objections made by the patrons of the company. The morning mail train which at present arrives at 11.10 will, under the new arrangement, arrive ten minutes later, 11.20, which change was made so that connections for this line from a new train on the Galt line. The most important change, however, is in the afternoon train going south, which now leaves at 3.35 and does not arrive in Toronto until 9.00. This train will in future leave at 4.25, make direct connection through Palmerston and arrive in Guelph at 6.40, connecting at that city with the main line train from Sarnia which has a parlour car and arrive in Toronto at 8.10. This change will be welcomed by the travelling public and is possibly the best that this section of Ontario will secure until business returns to normal and the old service which was very satisfactory, can be renewed.

RECOUNT IN BRANT

As was expected W. G. McCallum, ex-reeve of Brant, who was defeated by R. S. Nesbitt by a majority of one vote for the big chair at the recent municipal election, demanded an investigation or in plain speaking, a recount, and this was held on Saturday last. However this recount availed him nothing, which fact was welcomed, by not only the supporters of Mr. Nesbitt, but also a large number of those who cast their vote for Mr. McCallum who considered that in demanding an investigation he, as usual, displayed considerable nerve and was taking, what they considered to be an unnecessary procedure. At the public meeting in the town hall on Monday evening of last week, the ex-reeve stated to the electors present, from the platform, that he would be content and abide by the will of the people and that he should "right-about-face" and demand an investigation was more than they expected even of W. G. Be that as it may, however, he did not benefit by his investigation, which is the all-important fact. In the recount of the ballots from the Maple Hill poll two more were added to Mr. Nesbitt's majority while from each of the Malcolm and Elmwood boxes one was added in favor of Mr. McCallum, which left the the majority of one as formerly for Mr. Nesbitt. The latter is now the undisputed reeve of one of the best and richest townships in Bruce County, while Mr. McCallum will find it hard at any future date to do the "come-back" stunt and win honors for himself in municipal politics.

Town Council

The Town Council met on Monday morning for the purpose of taking oath of office for 1915 and appointing a striking committee to appoint the standing committees. This duty was given to Messrs. McNab, Johnston and Douglas and they submitted their report at the evening session of the Council having selected the committees as follows:—

CHIMNEY FIRE

A chimney fire at the home of Mr. Geo. Fisk on Yonge St., which threatened to be disastrous to the residence gave the firemen a run on Friday afternoon. The blaze was extinguished before the firemen reached the scene no damage being done.

FARMERS MEETING.

A meeting in the interest of Fruit Growers will be held in the Dept. of Agr. on Friday, Jan. 22nd, 1915. Mr. A. E. Eurin of the Dominion Fruit branch will give demonstrations in packing apples in boxes and barrels, grading fruit and stencilling the packages. Lectures will also be given dealing with orchard practice and spraying. 2.30 p. m., Friday, Jan. 22nd. 1915. N. C. MacKay Rep. Ont. Dept. of Agr.

Win the Opener.

In the hockey match played here on Tuesday night between the Walkerton Colts and Southampton N. H. L. teams the local septette emerged from the fray with the big end of a 6-5 score to their credit. By winning this, the opening game of the season, the locals have broken all previous records, as it was the usual occurrence that the visiting team should win the first game here, and the result has sent the Walkerton fans' hopes, for district honors, soaring.

The game was one of the best exhibitions of hockey witnessed in Victoria rink for several years and although the blue-and-white held the lead throughout it was by a narrow margin and it appeared to be anybody's game right up to the last. The pace set was fast and owing to lack of practice it was expected that the locals would "blow up" but they stuck to it like trojans and covered themselves with glory.

Referee McIvor of Southampton, started the game at 8.30 and from the beginning it was a battle royal. After ten minutes of play during which the Colts literally bombarded the Southampton nets a close-in shot fooled McKenny, who played a stellar game for the visitors, and the first tally was recorded. This was soon followed by another, a long shot by C. Oberle, from centre ice, and with the score 2-0 against them, the Southampton boys spruced up and after five minutes play slipped one into the Walkerton net. Before the end of the first period Walkerton added another to their credit, making the half-time score 3-1.

The second half was a repetition of the first with the visitors playing a somewhat better game and in twenty-five minutes they scored four while the locals notched two, thus tying the score 5-5. With five minutes to play the Colts jumped into the game at a furious pace and resumed the bombardment of their opponents goal, scoring the winning tally with but two minutes of play left. Southampton tried hard to even up but their efforts were fruitless, and the game ended with the score 6-5 against them.

The teams lined up:—

WALKERTON		SOUTHAMPTON
LaFrance	goal	McKenny
Rife	R defence	McVittie
Vegan	L "	McPhail
R. Oberle	rover	McPhail
H. Oberle	centre	Lounge
C. Oberle	L wing	Huber
Runstadtler	R "	Crawford

Notes

Walkerton defeated Southampton, Southampton defeated Port Elgin and Port Elgin defeated Mildmay. Can you figure out who will win the district?

Just before the end of the first half "Hermie" Runstadtler was struck on the head and received a gash which required two stitches. After Dr. Sinclair had patched him up Hermie had the appearance of a man from the trenches.

The Printers have organized a team and are open for challenges from any other septettes in town.

The next game at Walkerton will be played on the 22nd, inst., the visiting team being Mildmay.

There is not a weak spot on the team, LaFrance has made good in goal, Vegan and Rife play well together on the defence, the Oberle brothers are a trio hard to beat and Runstadtler has considerable stick-handling ability and is the best shot on the team.

Walkerton's victory was a hard blow to the Mildmayites, who witnessed the game. They expected to see Southampton have a walk away victory and cheered lustily for the green-and-white.

TRUE TO HIS RACE

Then the Honorable Stuart caught her around the waist, and laughing in a foolish, coaxing manner, attempted to take her back to the table.

Her brother also laughed.

Benjamin Hurst started forward, his usually gentle blue eyes blazing with wrath. But even before he could come to her rescue, Suzy had thrown her rude assailant off, and gained the door, where, standing for an instant, she said, with dignity:

"Benjamin Hurst, I charge you to see that gentleman out of the house, and attend him to his home. He is clearly not in a condition to take care of himself, any more than to be responsible for his ill-breeding."

And so saying, she passed out of sight.

"There! now you have done it! You see, you went too far! You were rude, you know," stuttered Mr. William.

"Rude! Really indeed! I should have been considered rude to a lady, I suppose; but is a gentleman expected to stand on ceremony with such as she?" inquired the Honorable Stuart, with a scornful laugh, for he was both very drunk and very angry.

"I say, look here, you know! What the deuce do you mean by that?" hiccoughed Mr. William, as he poured out and turned off another bumper of champagne.

"Come, sir!" said Benjamin Hurst, firmly. "Mademoiselle desired that I should see you safe out of this house, and into your room. I am ready to attend you."

"So am I ready!" laughed the inebriate, defiantly.

"But hold on! I say, look here, you know!" repeated Mr. William, in a half-muddled dignity. "What do you mean, you know?"

"I mean to go home, that's what I mean. Here, you fellow! show me to the door," answered Mr. Stuart Fitzroy, with a reckless air.

Benjamin handed him his hat and gloves, and then took his arm to assist his rather uncertain steps.

Benjamin Hurst took his charge out upon the sidewalk and began to lead him along, with the intention of hailing the first empty cab that passed.

Meanwhile, Mr. William sat over the wine at the deserted supper-table, pouring out and drinking champagne as freely as a thirsty man would drink water. And he brooded over the contemptuous words that Fitzroy had used in reference to his sister.

"What the devil did he mean by—by 'such's she?'" he inquired of himself. They he drank more wine and muttered:

"Meant something 'fensive, know he did. What dev'l was't?" And he drank still more wine and grumbled:

"Ought to called—called 'm to 'count for 's words 'bout my sister." And again he drank yet more wine, and then he staggered to his feet, muttering:

"Do it yet. Do it, sure. Call 'm to 'count for 's 'sulting words 'bout my sister!"

The fresh air helped him also, and partly sobered him, so that he was able to walk steadily and quickly, and to overtake speedily the man he was pursuing.

"I say, look here, you know! Hold on! I want to speak to you!" he said, laying his hand on the shoulder of Fitzroy.

"Well, fellow! well, what do you want of me?" grandly inquired this last inebriate.

"Want t' know what dev'l you meant by the words y' used in reference t' my sister?"

"Meant what I said—that a gentleman needn't stand in ceremony with such as she," doggedly replied Fitzroy.

"Look here! I say, you know! What dev'l d' you mean by such 's she?" persisted William, following him up.

"I mean she's only a very common person! Now don't bore me about your worthless sister!" said Fitzroy, scornfully.

"Take that, you dog, for daring to insult a gentleman!"

The sting of that blow drove the already infuriated young man to perfect frenzy. He drew back for an instant, and threw himself with all his force upon his assailant, seizing him by the throat, and hurling him with violence to the ground.

Fitzroy fell heavily, struck the back of his head against the sharp corner of a curbstone, quivered for a few seconds, and then lay perfectly still.

And all this happened with the rapidity of lightning, so that Benjamin Hurst could not, if he would, have interfered to prevent the catastrophe.

"Come! I say! Get up and have it out like a man!" said Mr. William, half fearfully, half recklessly.

Benjamin Hurst stooped down, and passed his hand under the back of the man's head to raise it from the curbstone, but quickly withdrew his hand, and gazed upon his fingers in consternation and sickening horror.

"Come! up with you, if you've as much heart as a hare, and have it out with me here and now!" repeated Mr. William, bending over the fallen man, and speaking, half in dread and half in defiance.

"Mr. William—oh, my Lord!—he will never get up any more," said Benjamin, in awe.

"He is dead, sir," solemnly answered Benny.

"Quite dead!" answered Benjamin, with a shudder. "The back of his head is crushed upon the sharp corner of the curbstone. Oh, see!" he added, exhibiting his hand, stained and smeared with blood and brains.

"Oh, my Lord! my Lord! Am I a murderer? Have I lived to commit a murder and to perish on the scaffold!" cried William Juniper, wildly wringing his hands, and gazing in horror and terror upon the dead man.

"And it will ruin Suzy! and break my poor mother's heart! And I never meant to kill him. Oh, my Lord! my Lord! what shall I do? what shall I do?" he cried, tearing his hair.

These frantic, despairing words brought Benjamin to his senses.

With him, to think quickly, and act promptly, on an emergency, was quite natural.

"Mr. William," he said, speaking fast, "you intend going to Paris on your sister's business to-morrow, do you not?"

"I did. But where shall I be to-morrow. In Newgate, probably!" cried the young man, tearing a handful of hair from his head.

"No; go now! hurry! fly! You have just time to catch the mail train that leaves for Dover about 2.30, to meet the early steamer. Fly, Mr. William, for Suzy's sake. You have money with you?"

"Take my pocketbook, then! Yes; there, take it! This is no time for hesitation or scruples. That's right. Now, fly! I hear footsteps coming around the corner," breathlessly spoke Benjamin, as he forced his porte-monnaie into the hands of the half-frenzied homicide, and hurried him away.

He watched him cross the street, and turn down another leading in the direction of the Dover railway station.

Then Benjamin turned to meet his fate.

CHAPTER XXII.

He thought, with pity and horror, of the murdered man, with pity and terror, of Suzy's brother; with the deepest sorrow and anxiety, of Suzy herself; but he never once thought of the awful peril in which he placed his own life and liberty.

He turned to face the approaching footsteps.

Two policemen came around the corner and up to the fatal spot.

"Now, then, what have you been up to?" demanded the first one, stepping short, speaking to Benjamin, but looking down upon the fallen man.

"What's all this, White? A man dead drunk?" demanded the second officer, coming nearer, and turning the bull's-eye of his lantern upon the face of the murdered man.

"He was certainly drunk when he fell," replied Benjamin, truly but incautiously.

"Fell?" echoed the first man, whom his companion had addressed by the name of White. "Fell, do you say?" And he took the lantern from his comrade, and stooped and examined the body. "This man never fell of himself. Here are marks of violence on his face and throat. He has been knocked down and probably robbed, and seriously injured. Hold the lantern a moment, Sefton."

The second officer took the offered light and held it, while the first one knelt down to raise the head of the corpse; but he quickly withdrew his hand, gazed at it in curiosity, and uttered an exclamation of consternation and horror.

"Heaven and earth, here's been a murder! Secure that man!"

In an instant Sefton seized Benny, while White sprung his alarm rattle.

"You need not take so much trouble. I will go with you quietly, for I have nothing to fear. I did not kill the man," said Benny.

"Then, of course, you'll be all right, you know. But we must take you, all the same, for by your own admission you saw him fall, for you know you told us he was drunk when he fell. Now, you see, he didn't fall. The marks on his face and throat prove that he was knock'd down, either by you or someone in your presence. So you must go along with us, whether to be considered as a witness or a principal the magistrate will decide," said Sefton, keeping a firm hold of Benny's arm.

With a deep sigh, as though yielding to the inexorable fate that pursued him through all his life, Benny dropped his head upon his breast and was silent.

Meanwhile the alarm rattle was going at a startling rate; so that even at that most lonely hour of the morning in the streets, two o'clock after midnight, a small crowd began to collect, with excited faces and eager inquiries.

Policeman White told all he knew of the circumstances as briefly as possible, and they listened as well as they could to the tumult.

"It is the body of a gentleman," said one.

"Will we take it to the St. James?" inquired another.

"No," said Policeman White. "We will leave it just here as it lies, until we take this suspected person to the station house, and then we'll report the case to our sergeant and take his orders about where it is to be carried."

And then he beckoned two of his companions of the force, and ordered them to guard the body, while he and his comrade, Sefton, should take the prisoner to the station and report the murder.

And then Benjamin Hurst was marched off between two policemen to the station house on Little Vine street, where, in a close, ill-favored office, a sergeant sat at a desk, with three or four attendants around him.

The policeman led Benny up to the desk and related all the circumstances of his discovery of the dead body on the sidewalk in Piccadilly.

"What is your name, young man?" enquired the sergeant of Benny, when the officer had finished his story.

"Benjamin Hurst, sir," replied the prisoner.

"Now I warn you that you need not say a word to criminate yourself; but if you can say anything, and prove anything to clear yourself from suspicion, you had better do so at once."

"I thank you, sir," said Benny, with a slight bend of the head.

"Can you, then, tell us anything about this murder?"

"No, sir, I can tell you nothing about it except this—that I certainly did not kill the unfortunate man," said Benny, earnestly.

The sergeant of police listened to him, looked at him and believed him, but had to do his stern duty nevertheless.

"If you can prove that now!" he began.

"I cannot prove it, sir," answered Benny resignedly, as he recognized in all its horror the full import of the awful sacrifice he was about to make to save the life of Suzy's brother, and the peace of Suzy's mind.

"Can you not explain your presence on the premises at the time of the murder?"

"No, sir, I cannot."

"At least you can tell whether you were acquainted with the deceased?"

Benny reflected for a moment as to whether it might be safe to answer this simple question; and then still feeling doubtful on the subject, he answered civilly:

"If you please, sir, I prefer not to answer any more questions."

"You may be right. You are at least very discreet. Yet I am sorry for you, for we shall be obliged to lock you up. Officer, remove the prisoner," said the sergeant.

Policeman White took possession of Benny to lead him away, while Policeman Sefton, coming forward and touching his hat, enquired:

"If you please, sir, what is to be done with the body of the murdered man for the present? There's the St. James near at hand, and quite convenient, and there's——"

"Have the body brought here for the present. The inspector will be here soon. And the coroner must be notified immediately," said the sergeant.

And Policeman Sefton went out to obey these orders, while Policeman White conducted Benny to a lockup room occupied by five or six other prisoners, and secured him there for the night.

Very early in the morning Benjamin Hurst was brought from the station house to the police court for examination.

Each of the two policemen who had discovered the murdered man and arrested the supposed murderer, in turn gave in his report, and their reports corresponded accurately.

"What have you to say to this charge?" enquired the magistrate, sternly regarding the prisoner.

"Nothing, your worship, except that I did not kill the man," respectfully replied Benny.

"You were with him when he was killed; you saw him fall; you admitted as much to the policemen here."

"I said that he was drunk when he fell," Benny amended.

"Then you saw him fall, of course; and it appears from the marks of violence upon his face and throat, testified to by both these officers, that he fell, not because he was drunk, but because he was murderously assaulted. Now then, if you yourself made the assault, you are not expected to criminate yourself here by any admission of the fact. If, on the other hand, you did not make it, but saw it made, you are strongly advised to tell all you know about it, and thus save yourself."

"I did not assault the man, your worship. That is all I have to say," replied Benny.

"Then I shall have to remand you to prison to await the issue of the coroner's inquest," said the magistrate.

And Benjamin Hurst was led away.

Suzy Juniper's consternation was too great for words when she heard of the tragedy. She was called as a witness at the inquest and there she said all she could in favor of Benny; but the overwhelming evidence adduced was too great, and he was committed to Newgate prison to await trial for willful murder.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"Mademoiselle Arielle" was never seen on the stage again.

The shock of Stuart Fitzroy's tragic death, and Benjamin Hurst's committal on the charge of murder, utterly prostrated her nervous system.

The Earl of Wellrose heard of the horrible murder of Mr. Stuart Fitzroy, in Piccadilly, as that unfortunate gentleman was returning from a little supper with Mademoiselle Arielle in Park Lane, and of the consequent illness, and absence from her part, of the young prima donna.

And he called to make anxious inquiries about the singer's health.

She greeted him with gentle courtesy, and begged that he would sit down near her.

"But I am very much grieved to find you in so much sorrow," said his lordship, tenderly.

"It is for Benjamin Hurst! You know he was committed to Newgate on the charge of murder. And oh, Lord Wellrose, he never did it! Benny never, never did it!" she said, bursting into tears, and sobbing hysterically.

"My best beloved," said the young earl, gently, and all the more calmly because she was so much excited; "my own dearest Susan, you must not despair because a coroner's jury has brought in a verdict against him. It was really upon very insufficient evidence. And coroners, moreover, are mostly Dogberrys. A judge is another sort of man—a man of superior learning and wisdom, who holds his high office in virtue of these qualities. Benjamin will have a fair trial. And as the evidence is really quite insufficient to convict him, he will be acquitted; and after his acquittal my dearest Suzy, it shall be my very first care to advance him in life."

"Oh, thanks! thanks! thanks! Oh! you give me hope! You think there's good ground for hope? You really do?" eagerly exclaimed Suzy.

"I know there is ground for hope, and none for fear. Benjamin's imprisonment and impending trial are misfortunes that we cannot prevent, but they will be the extent of his troubles, and we can mitigate them. I shall see to engaging the best counsel for him. It shall be my first business to do so to-day."

"Oh, I thank you so much! And you will go to see him in his cell today, and speak some kind words to him?—poor, friendless boy!"

"Indeed I will! And let me tell you, Susan, that there is something in the poor young man that interests me strangely."

"Oh, Lord Wellrose, forgive me for daring to hint it, but——" Susan hesitated, and her pale face flushed for an instant.

"But what, my dearest? Speak freely," said the young earl, gently.

"Oh, Lord Wellrose, there may be some deep reason in nature that you know not of, for this strange interest you feel in Benjamin Hurst," she said, and then again paused.

"Truly there are hidden things in nature, dearest Suzy," he said, soothingly, though he did not see the drift of her words.

"I have the right to help him, and all who need my help, dearest Susan. But there is something you have to say to me and find difficulty in saying. Now, surely you may speak freely to me, my own," he said, gently pressing her hand, that he still held.

Neuralgia of the Heart

Mr. James G. Clark, Fosterville, York County, N. B., writes: "I have been a great sufferer from what the doctors said was neuralgia of the heart. The pain started in the back of the neck and worked down into the region of the heart. Though I had taken a lot of medicine of one kind and another, I could not get anything to help me until I used Dr. Chase's Nerve Food.

"When I began this treatment I could not rest in bed, except by sitting upright, on account of the dreadful pain about the heart and the quick, loud beating. The change which Dr. Chase's Nerve Food has made in my condition is wonderful. It has entirely overcome these symptoms, and is making me strong and well. If this statement will help to relieve the suffering of others, you are at liberty to use it."

"STARVING GERMANY."

(Pittsburg Gazette-Times.)

Meantime the world at large is not the people of the United Kingdom, are not losing sight of the fact that, despite the humiliation to which Germany has subjected Great Britain in domestic waters and near by, the Germans are showing signs of apprehension at British dominion of the seas. The claim that Germany can hold out for four years loses some of its value when precautions for the conservation of the food supply are taken and it is known that not only as to provisions, but as to materials and equipment generally, Great Britain has rendered it impossible for Germany to get assistance from outside of European countries that are either neutral or allied with Germany. In other words, the problem of starving out Germany is not as remote as it seemed earlier in the war. The process is slow, inevitably, and it's a long, long way to the end; but if the allies can stand off Germany by land in the western zone, and Russia cannot be defeated decisively in the east, and Great Britain is able to police the oceans, the question how Germany is to replenish becomes more difficult with each passing month.

"FORTIFIED TOWNS."

(New York Sun.)

According to the Koelnische Zeitung, Whitby and Scarborough, on the Yorkshire shore, are fortified towns because each has a coast guard station. Then the whole coast of England is fortified, for such stations are to be found everywhere from Land's End to the Orkneys, and back again. The coast guard's work is to suppress smuggling and aid vessels in distress.

OUT OF EVIL, GOOD.

(Montreal Gazette)

Who can tell what advantages may result from the truer, surer knowledge of each other due to the common service of the British and their Allies? Situations of almost unimaginable dramatic force have been precipitated—situations that marvellously disclose character and form imperishable landmarks in the moral history of humanity. Hitherto, much though there had been written of France by Englishmen, of England by Frenchmen, there was a vast world in the hearts of either nation that the other had never fathomed. Hereafter we shall know each other better. The same is true of Great Britain and Russia, of Great Britain and Belgium. As yet, we do not dare to forecast the end. But we have no cause to despair. We look with confidence to what lies before us and trust that the aggressors will receive a lesson by which they and all the world shall profit.

The Colors of Music.

There has just been installed at Queen's Hall in London a color organ for representing musical effects in terms of colored light thrown upon a screen, which has been designed expressly for the deaf. Each note played produces a corresponding color, and the color combinations are said to cause the same delight to the deaf ear as the harmonious sounds of a composition do to the normal ear. The organ was devised by Professor Wallace Rimington, and among those who have become very much interested in the project is M. Alexander Scriabin, a Russian composer, who has achieved a foremost position in European musical circles.

OSTRACIZED.

Feeling against Germany in the United States is so strong that it is said the upshot may be the Germans in that country may become a class apart, like the negroes. So far as the Super-Huns are concerned most Americans would prefer the colored people.

FOR MARRIED MEN.

(Guelph Mercury)

The married man who is not individually a "homester" is a failure. His home's got to be his hobby, his wife his best friend and his children his choicest playthings. The club, the lodge, the poolroom or the street have got to play second fiddle to the home, or the whole game's going to be a fluke.

FROM THE GHURKA.

Indian Soldier Tells of Their Favorite Pastime.

[A personal impression of the fighting on the Belgian border is given by one of the Third Ghurkas, now in hospital at Southampton.]

We were delighted to be called on to fight the battle of the Raj against the Germans. The shell fire was a bit troublesome at first, because it was far worse than anything we had ever experienced in frontier fighting, and few of us had had any experience of being under fire. We soon got used to it, and it didn't trouble us more than thunder.

The rifle fire wasn't so bad, for the Germans aren't very good shots. Still, it was annoying to us to have to lie still under it when we like to be getting to close grips. We were very happy when we were told one day that we were to have our turn at last, and get a chance of driving off the soldiers who were threatening the King-Emperor's authority.

We were close to the enemy when the order to charge came, and we went forward with one rush. We had fired the last volley, and each man was grasping his bayonet as we rushed on them. They didn't wait for us, but ran like frightened cows before a tiger. We were at their heels like panthers, and it was exciting work bayoneting them as they ran.

We were so excited we couldn't stop running, and we must have gone through their lines many times before we were recalled. It was on the way back that their cavalry tried to cut us off. Putting our knives in our teeth, we held our rifles with both hands across our breasts and checked the rush of their horsemen.

Then swinging the rifles round, we bayoneted the riders. I think the horses were terrified at this new move, and they reared, some of them throwing their riders in their terror. That part of the fight didn't last long, for they cleared off and we returned to camp, where we were cheered by the English and French.

We liked that very much, and it will be something to tell when we go back to India.

ARMAMENTS A STATE MONOPOLY

(Ottawa Citizen.)

So long as armament manufacture is a private industry it may be expected that army and navy officers will be recruited from the national service to the service of private interests, and orders will be executed for possible enemy countries. The new era of armament industry, whatever form it is destined to take after the war, should be a state monopoly. It would be as absurd to have the navy privately owned, as to leave armament manufacture as a source of revenue to private enterprise.

WORLD LESSON IN THE CANADIAN BORDER.

(From the Christian Science Monitor.)

More than 3,000 miles of boundary line extends across the North American continent between the United States and Canada. On one side of the line are approximately 100,000,000 people, on the other side approximately 10,000,000. On one side stretches a tier of thirteen sovereign states of the American nation; on the other stretches seven provinces of the Dominion of Canada. On one side floats the stars and stripes; on the other, the union jack. On each side, in addition to the native population, may be found, and in great numbers, natives or immediate descendants of natives of every country on the globe. Along the entire 3,000-thousand mile line imaginarily dividing United States and Canada there is not a fortress, a fort, a fortified city, an armed war vessel, a soldier or a gun. Along the entire line from New Brunswick to Victoria, from Washington to Maine, not a man is armed even with a pistol under governmental authority for the purpose of preventing anybody on one side from passing over to the other. Yet between these two nations, between these two peoples, peace has existed for a hundred years. Tens of thousands of Canadians cross over to the United States, tens of thousands of Americans cross over to Canada every year. It is all one on either side whether they stay or return. There is constant intercourse between Washington and British Columbia, between Michigan, Ohio, New York and Ontario, between the New England states and Quebec.

THE AEROPLANE.

You brought your little Zeppelins,
 You dropped your little bombs,
You thought we had no feeling
 In our tender little domes;
You thought you caught us napping
 But we'll show you just the same
We will meet you fair in battle
 With our flying aeroplanes

CHORUS

On you came a creeping,
 Thought we were a sleeping,
Sure that you could handle all the game
 We the watch were keeping,
Sure, we'll give you greeting
When we come in a sweeping
 In our aeroplane

We will meet you with a bayonet charge
 Upon the land so dry,
Or if you'd rather have us
 Afloating in the sky,
However you'd like to meet us
 We always play the game,
In the land so dry, or in the sky,
 Or in an aeroplane.

So take your little airship,
 And just you travel home,
It's not the best of policy
 So far away to roam
You may be killed upon the land,
 I'm sure you'll feel some pain
When we drop pebbles on your head
 From our flying aeroplane.

So keep your little Zeppelins
 And treasure up your bombs,
The chances are, you'll need them
 To guard your little homes,
And William may require them
 E'er his wings have grown,
He'll travel all the faster
 When he's on the run for home

PIMPLES SO BAD ASHAMED TO GO OUT

Also Terrible Rash on Arms. Itched and Burned. Could Not Sleep. Used Cuticura Soap and Ointment. Eruption All Disappeared.

Creasy, Ontario.—"For a long time I suffered from pimples and blackheads the worst way and I got a terrible rash on my arms. When I got in bed at night and got warm I would have to scratch my arms till blood came. The pimples all came to matter festers and then they broke leaving lots of little marks on my face. I was ashamed to go out with my friends. They also itched and burned until I could have torn my face and arms. I could not sleep at night and I rubbed my arms till they bled.

"One day when reading the paper I came across the Cuticura advertisement, then I thought I would try the Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I washed with the Cuticura Soap and then applied the Cuticura Ointment night and morning. I found great relief and in a short time my pimples and eruption all disappeared thanks to Cuticura Soap and Ointment." (Signed) George W. Key, Aug. 10, 1914.

FIRE LOSSES.

(Exchange.)

The fire losses in Canada and the United States have long been a disgrace to North American civilization. We are recklessly careless in regard to the safety of property as we are in regard to the safety of human life. German militarism has led to an unprecedented destruction of the youngest and best of the race, but the Old World has long shown us a worthy example in its comparatively small percentage of fire losses. The backwardness of this continent in this respect imposes an unfair penalty upon the average business man or householder. The exorbitant premiums, which he has to pay for fire insurance, spring directly from the carelessness or worse of those who are burned out, or from the recklessly imperfect building methods which obtain so largely in the New World, or from both.

THE BEATER BEATEN.

(London Free Press)

Five months ago [the Germans] were a nation filled with pride and self-confidence. Germany was a power in the world. Her influence was felt at every court and by every Government. Her will was not lightly to be set aside. Her credit was good. Her word was as her bond. What has happened that in so brief a period afterwards her people are subjected to the pain and humiliation of a scarcity of foodstuffs? The answer is that her enemies have gripped by the throat the once powerful and arrogant Germany. The beater has been beaten. And unless Germany can shake off this death grip her complete defeat cannot long be withstood, but has already in fact come.

MAN'S BEST AGE.

(Philadelphia Record.)

For those who have always scoffed at the Oslerian theory of man's uselessness after attaining three-score years it will come as a welcome confirmation of their views that, in the words of President E. H. Bryan, of Colgate University, "investigation by keen men has shown that man's best work has been done between the ages of [illegible] and 70." This, of course, refers especially to brainworkers, whose powers develop steadily, but often slowly. This is the way President Bryan sums it:

Six hundred of the most important scientists, statesmen and Old World famous men were selected and it was found that only [illegible] per cent. of them accomplished their world's work before the age of [illegible]; [illegible] per cent. between [illegible] and [illegible]; [illegible] per cent. between [illegible] and [illegible]; [illegible] per cent. between [illegible] and 70; [illegible] per cent. between 70 and [illegible]; and [illegible] per cent. after they had reached the age of [illegible].

CULTURE AND KULTUR.

(Stratford Beacon.)

The British invasion of Cuxhaven was not accompanied by baby killing. It gave the German fleet on the water, under the water and in the air an opportunity to defend itself—but there was no slaughter of non-combatants. That is the difference between British culture and German kultur in warfare.

MORE CHRISTIANITY NEEDED.

(London Advertiser)

Some critics of Christianity have urged that it has done nothing in two thousand years to end war. The reasons why Christianity has not prevented war are (1) and it has not been allowed to do so by those in all countries who say that the gospel and golden rule are right for the individual, but will not apply to governments, which are above religion; (2) that the German militarists have definitely discarded Christianity for a political version of Nietzscheanism.

What is needed is an extension of Christian morals to govern the actions of states as of individuals. German writers who have persistently argued that the state is the highest thing, and therefore not to be made subject to arbitration or to any law but that of its own making, are largely responsible for this war. Certainly Christianity has nothing to do with it nor with German methods of waging it.

Not only states, but the public activities in general of citizens, in other countries besides Germany, will have to be held to the golden rule before Christianity may be said to have had a fair trial. Grafting and boodling are as un-Christian as German methods of warfare, and perhaps are better known in several countries which might be named than in Germany. The millennium will set in when men cease to think of their wider social and political relations as less amenable to a Christian law than their private life.

UNCLE SAM'S POSE.

(Brantford Expositor.)

Uncle Sam finds the position of straddle-the-fence increasingly difficult. He finds it hard to keep his own skirts clear, and he finds it harder still to convince himself that some of the combatants, particularly Great Britain, are not seeking to take advantage of him.

In the matter of keeping neutrality he is holding himself so straight that he is leaning backward.

BRITANNIA RULES THE WAVES.

While German ships may make marauding excursions and bombard the seacoast of Britain, and while she may torpedo a vessel here and there and strew the sea with mines, Great Britain still controls the seven seas. Her shipping is everywhere, while Germany's are either captured or sunk or tied up in German or neutral ports. The British people know all this. But they have little idea as to what use Britain is making of the opportunity she thus has of navigating the waters of the world. As the Manchester Guardian said, the safe return of King George to London is but one proof of the splendid organization which marks our control of the sea. In a great war like the present, attention is too often diverted to small incidents, and the policy of secrecy adopted by the allies has tended to obscure the large achievements of our army and navy. Few people realize, for instance, that perpetual traffic is carried on between England and France, and that our communications with the watching fleet in the North Sea has never been broken since the beginning of August. At least a thousand vessels of the mercantile marine are in some way or other in service of the allies, carrying food, guns, munitions of war. The transport services from India, Australia and Canada have been and are being performed without a hitch. And in proportion to the numerous lines of steamers still plying regularly to India, the Far East, and Oceania, to the Mediterranean, Africa, and the North and South America, the damage inflicted by the raiders of the enemy has been comparatively slight. The ease, too, with which Britain has countered such movements as the threatened Turkish invasion of Egypt, has frustrated the rising in South Africa, and has thwarted German plans elsewhere, is a tribute to the intelligence department of the defensive services. And only the inhabitants of the Clyde, Belfast, Tyne, Barrow and other shipbuilding areas, and they but imperfectly, realize the nature of the powerful additions that are being made to the fleet.

The silent war continually going on in the North Sea is what is crushing the life out of Germany. While her armies in the field are now mostly on the defensive, her naval power has been shattered and has been rendered of little avail for real purposes of warfare.

GERMAN HATRED OF BRITAIN.

The British people have no consuming desire to annihilate or destroy the German people. Their chief desire is to see German militarism smashed and the menace of a rough shod Germany over all removed. Although they are beginning to see that this is not what they thought it was—the Kaiser's war—that the people of Germany are behind the Kaiser in it—they are not obsessed with bitter hatred of the Germans. There is something akin to pity for them that they should be misled and misruled by the military factions that govern the country. But in Germany it is different. There the most intense hatred is borne towards Britain. Bitter is the spirit against the British and bitter is the language they use to give expression to their disgust and hatred of everything British. They blame Britain for the war, and prophesy all sorts of evil things that will happen to her. As an instance of this hatred we may cite the Vossische Zeitung, which publishes a summary of a lecture delivered in Berlin on November 12th, Professor Josef Kohler, one of the most eminent jurists in Prussia. His theme was, "England and the World War." In the course of the lecture he said.

However much opinions may differ as to the character and behavior of France, Russia and Belgium, on one point we are all agreed, and that is our condemnation of England. Such treachery and brutality we had never expected even of England, whose entire policy it has always been to incite the Continental States against one another, concealing her own cunning under a mask of hypocrisy. Such a policy demanded a certain intelligence; but the people now at the head of the British Empire are weak-brained and ignorant dolts.

In spite of Russia's menacing attitude, Germany's loyal efforts would have limited the present conflict to the original two principals. Austria and Servia, had not the trickiness, ambiguity and brutality of Grey's policy got the upper hand. . . . As regards Germany, England acted the ridiculous comedy of Belgium's neutrality, though she knew better than anyone that Belgium had long abandoned her neutrality by entering into a secret treaty with England. . . . The Imperial Chancellor committed the serious legal error of admitting in the Reichstag a breach of neutrality, whereas in reality no such breach had taken place. England is a country without music and without morals. Her campaign of lies against Germany, which began after she had cut the cables, was unparalleled in history. England must be brought to her knees; she must be smashed to the ground, for otherwise we shall never have peace from this treacherous foe.

This is a repetition of what the German Chancellor said in the Reichstag. He declared that Britain could have prevented the war had she told Russia that she would not allow her to make a European war out of the Austrian attack on Servia. Possibly, Servia was not attacking Austria and Germany could have prevented the Austrian attack on Servia declaring that she would not support her in her attack on Servia. Had she done that there would have been no war, and no need to attack Belgium. The "conversations" make it quite plain that France had no intention of interfering with the neutrality of Belgium. She gave her word that she would not, and she did not. The real cause of Germany's hatred of Britain is that she upset the Kaiser's plans to overrun France and Belgium and defeat Russia. Her game failed, and she naturally and truly blames Britain for her failure.

SUFFERED WITH LAME BACK.

Could Hardly Straighten Up For Pain.

When the back becomes lame and starts to ache it is the sure sign of kidney trouble.

Mr. J. W. Axlett, South Oshawa, Ont., writes:—"I have much pleasure in recommending Doan's Kidney Pills. Last summer I suffered with a lame back. Sometimes I could hardly straighten up for the pain. I read about Doan's Kidney Pills and decided to give them a trial. I can truthfully say that the second box cured me. I can recommend them to all as a speedy cure to all suffering with backache."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

The United States Government has made a strong protest to the British Government against the latter's interference with U. S. shipping, while searching for contraband in the cargoes of those vessels. They declare that public opinion in the States is aroused against Britain, in consequence, and in a friendly but unmistakable way, ask that this interference be put a stop to. It goes without saying that Britain will do everything possible to satisfy the States, still it must have some assurance that contraband is not finding its way to Germany. Britain made a big concession to the States when it declared that cotton was not contraband.

At a meeting in London recently, held to further the appeal for the Indian soldiers' fund, Lord Curzon said that he would not say how many of these troops had left India, because he was not going to present a valuable secret to the German Emperor. But he knew, and the number was in all probability in excess of anything that the world believed. These brave men were fighting not merely at the front in France and Belgium; they were assisting our cause in Egypt, where it was extremely likely there would be fierce fighting before very long, and they were fighting for the flag in British East Africa. They were fighting under conditions extremely novel and most trying to them. Most of these men had been born and trained in a climate very different from that of France and Belgium in winter, and they could imagine the strain on the physique of men who had not naturally the robustness or experience of our own people.

A Public Idol

"Yes," said Wallace emphatically; "I believe it would wound her extremely. You see, in spite of all her success, she is beginning to be conscious that there are two publics in London. There is the small fastidious public of people who take the theatre seriously, and there is the large easy-going public who get the only sensation they want out of her beauty and her personal prestige. The enthusiasts have no difficulty, as yet, in holding their own against the scoffers, and for a long time Miss Bretherton knew and cared nothing for what the critical people said, but of late I have noticed at times that she knows more and cares more than she did. It seems to me that there is a little growing soreness in her mind, and just now if I refuse to let her have that play it will destroy her confidence in her friends, as it were. She won't reproach me, she won't quarrel with me, but it will go to her heart. Do, for heaven's sake, Kendal, help me to some plausible fiction or other!"

"I wish I could," said Kendal, pacing up and down, his gray hair falling forward over his brow. There was a pause, and then Kendal walked energetically up to his friend and laid his hand on his shoulder.

"You oughtn't to let her have that play, Wallace; I'm quite clear on that. You know how much I like her. She's all you say and more, but art is art, and acting is acting. I, at any rate, take these things seriously, and you do too. We rejoice in it for her sake; but, after all, when one comes to think of it, this popularity of hers is enough to make one despair. Sometimes I think it will throw back the popular dramatic taste for years. At any rate, I am clear that if a man has got hold of a fine work of art, as you have in that play, he has a duty to it and to the public. You are bound to see it brought out under the best possible conditions, and we all know that Miss Bretherton's acting, capped with Hawes', would kill it from the artistic point of view."

"Perfectly true, perfectly true," said Wallace. "Well, would you have me tell her so?"

"You must get out of it somehow. Tell her that the part is one you feel won't suit her—won't do her justice."

"Much good that would do! She thinks the part just made for her—costumes and all."

"Well, then, say you haven't finished your revision and you must have time for more work at it; that will postpone the thing, and she will hear of something else which will put it out of her head."

"There are various reasons against that," said Wallace; "it's hardly worth while going through them. In the first place, she wouldn't believe me; in the second, she won't forget it whatever happens, and it would only put the difficulty off a few weeks at most. I feel so stupid about the whole thing. I like her too much. I'm so afraid of saying anything to hurt her, that I can't finesse. All my wits desert me. I say, Kendal!"

"Well?"

Wallace hesitated and glanced up at his friend with his most winning expression.

"Do you think you could earn my eternal gratitude and manage the thing for me? You know we're going to Oxford next Sunday, and I suppose we shall go to Nuneham, and there will be opportunities for walks, and so on. Could you possibly take it in hand? She has an immense respect for you intellectually. If you tell her that you're sure the part won't suit her, that she won't do herself justice in it; if you could lead the conversation on to it and try to put her out of love for the scheme without seeming to have a commission from me in any way, I should be indeed everlastingly obliged! You wouldn't make a mess of it, as I should be sure to do. You'd keep your head cool."

"Well!" said Kendal laughing, balancing himself on the table facing Wallace. "That's a tempting prospect! But if I don't help you out you'll give in, I know; you're the softest of men, and I don't want you to give in."

"Yes, of course I shall give in," said Wallace, with smiling decision. "If you don't want me to, suppose you take the responsibility. I've known you do difficult things before; you manage somehow to get your own way without offending people."

"H'm," said Kendal; "I don't know whether that's flattery or not." He began to walk up and down the room again, cogitating. "I don't mind trying," he said at last, "in a very gingerly way. I can't, of course, undertake to be brutal. It would be impossible for anyone to treat her roughly. But there might be ways of doing it. There's time to think over the best way of doing it. Supposing, however, she took offence? Supposing, after Sunday next, she never speaks to either of us again?"

"Oh!" said Wallace, wincing, "I should give up the play at once if she really took it to heart. She attaches me to her. I feel toward her as though she were a sister—only more interesting, because there's the charm of novelty."

Kendal smiled. "Miss Bretherton hasn't got to that yet with me. Sisters, to my mind, are as interesting as anybody, and more so. But how on earth, Wallace, have you escaped falling in love with her all this time?"

"Oh, I had enough of that last year," said Wallace, abruptly rising and looking over his overcoat, while his face darkened; "it's an experience I don't take lightly."

Kendal was puzzled, then his thoughts quickly put two and two together. He remembered a young Canadian widow who had been a good deal at Mrs. Stuart's house the year before; he recalled certain suspicions of his own about her and his friend—her departure for London and Wallace's long absence in the country. But he said nothing, unless there was sympathy in the cordial grip of his hand as he accompanied the other to the door.

On the threshold Wallace turned irresolutely. "It will be a risk next Sunday," he said; "I'm determined it shan't be anything more. She is not the woman, I think, to make a quarrel out of a thing like that."

"Oh, no," said Kendal. "keep your courage up. I think it may be managed. You give me leave to handle 'Elvira' as I like."

"Oh, heavens, yes!" said Wallace; "get me out of the scrape any way you can, and I'll bless you forever. What a brute I am never to have asked after your work! Does it go on?"

"As much as any work can in London just now. I must take it away with me somewhere into the country next month. It doesn't like dinner parties."

"Like me," said Wallace, with a shrug.

"Nonsense!" said Kendal; "you're made for them. Good-night."

"Good-night. It's awfully good of you."

"What! Wait till it's all over!"

Wallace ran down the stairs and was gone. Kendal walked back slowly into his room and stood meditating. It seemed to him that Wallace did not quite realize the magnificence of his self-devotion. "For, after all, it's an awkward business," he said to himself, shaking his head over his own temerity. "How am I to come around a girl as frank, as direct, as unconventional as that, I don't quite know! But she ought not to have that play. It's one of the few good things that have been done for the English stage for a long time past. It's well put together, the plot good, three or four strongly marked characters, and some fine Victor Hugoish dialogue, especially in the last act. But there is extravagance in it, as there is in all the work of that time, and in Isabel Bretherton's hands a great deal of it would be grotesque; nothing would save it but her reputation and the get-up, and that would be too great a shame. No, no! It will not do to have the real thing swamped by all sorts of irrelevant considerations in this way. I like Miss Bretherton heartily, but I like good work, and if I can save the play from her, I shall save her too from what everybody with eyes in his head would see to be a failure!"

It was a rash determination. Most men would have prudently left the matter to those whom it immediately concerned, but Kendal had a quixotic side to him, and at this time in his life a whole-hearted devotion to certain intellectual interests, which decided his action on a point like this. In spite of his life in society, books and ideas were at this moment much more real to him than men and women. He judged life from the standpoint of the student and the man of letters, in whom even considerations, which would have seemed abstract and unreal to other people, had become magnified and all-important. In this matter of Wallace and Miss Bretherton he saw the struggle between an ideal interest, so to speak, and a personal interest, and he was heart and soul for the ideal. Face to face with the living human creature concerned, his principles, as we have seen, were apt to give way a little, for the self underneath was warm-hearted and impressionable, but in his own room and by himself they were strong and vigorous, and would allow of no compromise.

He ruminated over the matter during his solitary meal, planning his line of action. "It all depends," he said to himself, "on that. If what Wallace says about her is true, if my opinion has really any weight with her, I shall be able to manage it without offending her. It's good of her to speak of me as kindly as she seems to do; I was anything but amiable on that Surrey Sunday. However, I felt then that she liked me all the better for plain-speaking; one may be tolerably safe when her that she won't take offence unreasonably. What a picture she made as she pulled the primroses to pieces—it seemed all up with one! And then her smile flashing out—her eagerness to make amends—to sweep away a harsh impression—her pretty gratefulness—enchanting!"

On Saturday, at lunch time, Wallace rushed in a few minutes to say that he himself had avoided Miss Bretherton all the week, but that things were coming to a crisis. "I've just got this note from her," he said, despairingly, spreading it out before Kendal, who was making a scrappy bachelor meal, with a book on each side of him, at a table littered with papers.

"Could anything be more prettily done? If you don't succeed to-morrow, Kendal, I shall have signed the agreement before three days are over!"

It was indeed a charming note. She asked him to fix any time he chose for an appointment with her and her business manager, and spoke with enthusiasm of the play. "It cannot help being a great success," she wrote. "I feel that I am not worthy of it, but I will do my very best. The part seems to me, in many respects, as though it had been written for me. You have never, indeed, I remember, consented to so many words to let me have 'Elvira.' I [illegible] at Mrs. Stuart's yesterday, and was disappointed. But I am sure you will not say me nay, and you will see how grateful I shall be for the chance your work will give me!"

"Yes, that's done with real delicacy," said Kendal. "Not a word of the pecuniary advantages of her offer, though she must know that almost any author would give his eyes just now for such a proposal. Well, we shall see. If I can't make the thing look less attractive to her without rousing her suspicions, and if you can't screw up your courage to her face—why, you must sign the agreement, my dear fellow, and make the best of it; you will find something else to inspire you before long."

"It's most awkward," sighed Wallace, as though making up his perplexed mind with difficulty. "The great chance is that by Agnes' account she is very much inclined to regard your opinion as a sort of intellectual standard; she has two or three times talked of [illegible] of yours as if they had struck her. Don't quote me at all, [illegible]. Do it as impersonally as you can."

"If you give me too many instructions," said Kendal, returning the letter with a smile, "I shall bungle it. Don't make me nervous. I can't promise to succeed, and you mustn't bear me a grudge if I fail."

"A grudge! No, I should think not. By the way, have you heard from Agnes about the trains to-morrow?"

"Yes, Paddington, 11 o'clock, and there is an 8.25 train back from Culham. Mrs. Stuart says we're to lunch at Balliol and go down to Nuneham afterward and have the boats there to bring us back."

"Yes, [illegible] with that friend of yours. I think you know him—Herbert Sartoris, the best fellow. Balliol don for [illegible]. I only trust the weather will be what it is to-day."

"The weather was all that the heart of man could desire, and the party met on the Paddington platform with every prospect of another successful day. Forbes turned his pencil to the moment, and radiant under the combined influence of the sunshine and of Miss Bretherton's presence; Wallace had made all the arrangements perfectly, and the six friends found themselves presently journeying along to Oxford, at that moderated speed which is all that a Sunday express can reach. The talk flowed with ease, and gayety; the Surrey Sunday was a pleasant memory in the background and all were glad to find themselves in the same company again. It seemed to Kendal that Miss Bretherton was looking rather thin and pale, but she would not admit it, and chattered from her corner to Forbes and himself with the mirth and abandon of a child on its holiday. At last the "dreaming spires" of Oxford rose from their green, river-threaded plain and they were at their journey's end. A few more minutes saw them alighting at the gate of the new Balliol, where stood Herbert Sartoris, looking out for them. He was a young don with a classical edition on hand, which kept him working after term within reach of the libraries, and he led the way to some pleasant rooms overlooking the large quadrangle at Balliol, showing in his well-bred look and manner an abundant consciousness of the enormous good fortune which had sent him Isabel Bretherton for a guest. For at that time it was almost as difficult to obtain the presence of Miss Bretherton at any social festivity as it was to obtain that of royalty. Her Sundays were the objects of conspiracies for weeks beforehand on the part of those persons in London society who were least accustomed to have their invitations refused; and to have managed to hold the famous beauty for more than an hour in his own rooms, and then to enjoy the privilege of spending five or six long hours on the river by her side—delights which, as the happy young man felt, would render him the object of envy to all at least of his fellow-dons below forty.

In she stirred the party filling up the book-lined rooms and startling the two old scouts in attendance into an unwonted rapidity of action. Miss Bretherton wandered round, surveyed the familiar Oxford luncheon-table, standing under the time-honored fare, the books, the engravings, and the sunny, irregular quadrangle outside, with its rich adornings of green, and threw herself down at last on to the low window seat with a sigh of satisfaction.

"How quiet you are! how peaceful! how delighted it must be to live here! It seems as if one were in another world from London. Tell me what that building is over there. It's too new, it ought to be old and gray like the colleges we saw coming up here. Is everything going—gone down, you say? I should like to see all the [illegible] while [illegible] walking about [illegible]."

"I could show you a good many if there were time," said young Sartoris, hardly knowing, however, what he was saying, so lost was he in admiration of that marvelous changing face. "The variation is the time they show themselves. It's like owls coming out at night. You see, Miss Bretherton, we don't keep many of them; they're in the way in term time. But in vacation they have the colleges and the parks and the Bodleian to themselves, and you may study their ways, and their spectacles, and their umbrellas, under the most favorable conditions."

"Oh, yes," said Miss Bretherton, with a little laugh, "people always make fun of what they are proud of. But I mean to believe that you are all learned and that everybody here works himself to death, and that Oxford is quite, quite perfect!"

"Did you hear what Miss Bretherton was saying, Mrs. Stuart?" said Forbes when they were seated at luncheon. "Really, I don't think I quite like it. It's too bad to last."

"Oh, I am such a changeable creature, then!" said Miss Bretherton, smiling at him. "Do you generally find my enthusiasms cool down?"

"You are as constant as you are kind," said Forbes, bowing to her; "I am only like a child who sighs to see a pleasure nearing its highest point lest there should be nothing so good afterward."

"Nothing so good!" she said "and I have only had one little drive through the streets. Mr Wallace, are you and Mrs. Stuart really going to forbid me sight-seeing?"

"Of course!" said Wallace emphatically. "That's one of the fundamental rules of the society. Our charter would be a dead letter if we let you enter a single college on your way to the river to-day."

"The only art, my dear Isabel," said Mrs. Stuart, "that you will be allowed to study to-day, will be the art of conversation."

"And a most fatiguing one, too!" exclaimed Forbes; "It beats sight-seeing hollow. But, my dear Miss Bretherton, Kendal and I will make it up to you. We'll give you an illustrated history of Oxford on the way to Nuneham. I'll do the pictures, and he shall do the letterpress. Oh! Oh! the good times I've had up here—much better than he ever had. A plodding scribe was Kendal," who was listening. "He was too proper behaved to enjoy himself; he got all the right things, all the proper first-classes and prizes, poor fellow! But as for me, I used to scribble over my note-books all lecture-time and amuse myself the rest of the day. And then, you see, I was up twenty years earlier than he was, and the world was not as virtuous then as it is now, by a long way."

Kendal was interrupting, when Forbes, who was in one of his maddest moods, turned round upon his chair to watch a figure passing along the quadrangle in front of the bay-window.

"I say, Sartoris, isn't that Camden, the tutor who was turned out of Magdalen a year or two ago for the atheistical book of his, and whom you took in, as you do all the disreputables? Ah, I knew it!

By the pricking of my thumbs
Something wicked this way comes."

That's not mine, my dear Miss Bretherton, it's Shakespeare's first, Charles Lamb's afterwards. But look at him well—he's a heretic, a real, genuine heretic. Twenty years ago it would have been a thrilling sight; but now, alas! it's so common that it's not the victim, but the persecutors who are the curiosity."

A NIGHTMARE.

(London Free Press.)

Surely it is a terrible nightmare that 1914 has brought in its train. If we might we would wipe the year from memory. We would erase it from the calendar of the years. We would go back to the days of peace, and would forget that men can set [illegible] each other at the bidding of their leaders with all the zest and intent that we should have liked to believe had been left behind in the long ago.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON III.—January 17, 1915. The Call of Gideon—Judge 6: 11-40.

COMMENTARY.—I. Gideon's call (vs. 11-16). 11. an angel of the Lord—It is quite evident that this was he who appeared later as the Messiah. The Revised Version uses the definite article and says, "The angel of the Lord." See Gen. 18:2; Josh. 5: 13; Judges 13:3. Ophrah—The location is uncertain further than that it was a town in Manasseh, threshed wheat by the winepress—"Was beating out wheat in the winepress."—R. V. The language indicates the terror the Midianites brought upon the people of Israel. The usual method of thrashing grain, having oxen tread it out on smooth, hard spaces of ground, was abandoned, and Gideon was using a stick to beat out the wheat in a winepress where there was not enough space to use even a frail. In the winepress, which was probably a hollowed out rock, he could hide both the grain and the process of thrashing. Midianites—The decendants of Abraham and Keturah. They occupied the Sinatic peninsula, and had sallied forth from thence to ravage the land of Israel. Moses gained a victory over them just before his death, and for two centuries they had not troubled Israel. They now had become strong and were oppressive.

12. Appeared unto him—The call came to Gideon while he was at his work, which was humble but he was doing the best he could under the circumstances. The Lord is with thee—To the knowledge of the fact which Gideon had already, this was a welcome and added assurance. It is an inspiration, a source of strength, to have a divine conviction of God's presence. Thou mighty man of valour—He was the kind of man for the task which was to be assigned to him. He had physical strength and courage. He had spiritual power, for God was with him. 13. If the Lord be with us, why, etc. This was a most natural question to occur to Gideon under the circumstances. The Lord told Gideon that he was with him, not that he was with the people of Israel as a whole. Gideon might well say that the Lord had wrought miracles for Israel's sake in the past, but now he had forsaken them. 14. Go in this thy might—Nothing of the past or of the present should be a hindrance to the fulfillment of God's purpose to deliver Israel. Gideon's might consisted of his physical strength his courage and his contact with the Lord. Thou shalt save Israel—The promise is direct and positive. The command was for him to go and success was promised. Have not I sent thee—This question is equivalent to the positive declaration, "I have sent thee."

15. Wherewith shall I save Israel—Gideon was looking over his own resources to see what he could find that would be likely to constitute him a deliverer of Israel, and he could see nothing to himself or in his family in his favor. His family was not noted or rich, and he felt that he was the most uncompromising in the family. His humility was greatly in his favor. 16. Surely I will be with thee—Such a promise as this was most reassuring. A similar promise was given to Moses (Exod. 3: 12) and to Joshua (Josh. 1.5) and to the apostles (Matt. 28:20), hence the promise is for all who fully obey the Lord. As one man—As if all the Midianitish host was a single individual, and he was executed at a stroke—Whedon. The promise shows the suddenness with which the power of Midian would be broken.

II. A sign sought (vs. 17-24). In a matter of such great importance as this, Gideon believed he should have the most perfect assurance that he was being divinely led. This together with his true hospitality led him to desire the messenger to remain and partake of the food he would prepare. What the angel of the Lord would do with the food, might reveal to him whether the messenger was divine or human. When the angel of the Lord touched with his staff the food he had prepared for him, fire came forth from the rock and consumed all the repast that had been provided. Then Gideon was convinced that a heavenly messenger had visited him, and he was afraid. The Lord spoke to him and allayed his fears. Gideon built an altar and called it Jehovah-shalom, the Lord send peace.

III. Baal's altar destroyed (vs. 25-32). That very night the Lord told Gideon to pull down the altar of Baal and destroy the grove by it. The grove was a wooden pole or statue of Asherah, the female deity corresponding to Baal. Gideon was to cut this up and use it in sacrificing a bullock upon an altar he was to build out of the stones that had composed the altar of Baal. He did this by night. In the morning the men of the place saw that the altar had been destroyed and they accused Gideon of doing it, and demanded that he should be slain. Joash, his father, would not consent to that, saying that Baal should have protected his own altar. The people gave Gideon the name, Jerubbaal, which means Baal-fighter.

IV. Gideon assured (vs. 33-40). 33. Amalekites—A wandering race which was then a band of robbers, occupying parts of Canaan. Children of the east—Wandering tribes whose place was east of the Jordan. These people joined with the Midianites in their plundering expeditions through Palestine. Pitched in the valley of Jezreel—They encamped in the fertile plain or valley leading from the broad plain of Esdraelon to the Jordan. They were there for plunder. 34. The Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon. The Spirit "wrapped him round as with a garment" or took possession of him and moved him to action. Blew a trumpet—This was the signal for the men of war to assemble. Abi-ezer—The family to which Gideon belonged. 35. Sent messengers—The tribes of Asher, Zebulun and Naphtali lay close to Manasseh, to which Gideon belonged, and it was not a great undertaking for the fighting men to gather from thence to Gideon.

36. If thou wilt save.... as thou hast said—Gideon believed God, and yet his heart craved still greater assurance. He could test the matter further. 37. Dew be on the fleece only—There are heavy dews in those regions. 38. A bowl full of water—The test was in accordance with Gideon's wish. The fleece was decidedly wet. 39. Let not thine anger be hot against me—Gideon feared the Lord's displeasure, yet his caution respecting the great work before him led him to make a further test. Upon all the ground let there be dew—The test was renewed with conditions reversed. 40. God did so—He saw the sincerity of Gideon and did not chide him nor refuse his request. The fleece was dry and the ground all around was wet with dew. Gideon had no further questionings.

Questions.—What enemies were troubling Israel? Describe the condition of the Israelites at this time. Who came to Gideon with a message? Who was Gideon and what was he doing? What was he called to do? What sign was given him by the angel of the Lord? What was the first work Gideon was commanded to do? What tribes did Gideon call upon for men of war? Describe the tests which Gideon proposed. Why did he propose these tests?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Deliverance for Israel.
I. From the worship of Baal.
II. From the yoke of Midian.

I. From the worship of Baal. This lesson reveals an extraordinary change in the whole aspect of things in Israel. The chapter opens with a vivid description of the ravages of the Midianites, and the pitiable distress to which Israel was reduced. For seven successive years those ravages were committed, until Israel had become greatly impoverished and disheartened. In all that time not one cry of repentance was heard; not one act of faith in the true God. Spiritual apostasy had brought Israel into national humiliation. When, at last, they cried to the Lord because of the Midianites" the Lord by his prophet declared the cause of all their trouble to be their disobedience to Him. Their idolatry had brought upon them the terrible Midianite servitude. God answered Israel's cry in the call of Gideon. The divine eye penetrated to the very depths of Gideon's spirit and character and saw in him the very qualities for His special mission. As a man of valor Gideon was as much unknown to himself as he was to Israel or his enemies. It was difficult for him to reconcile the assurance of God's presence with the signs of actual weakness and distress all around him. Yet he was not at liberty to follow his own private aims when the heavenly voice spoke within him. He must rise, act, dare and ask. "The man, the warrior, the captain, the deliverer, the hero must be awakened in him. His own life had to be openly changed. His family had to witness his zeal for God. The growth of Gideon's habitual character was rapid and decisive. His might consisted in his wholehearted loyalty to God and his humble dependence upon him, coupled with his faith in God's promise and the consciousness of a divine mission. With his commission came the wisdom, the might, the valor, the strategic skill needed to fit him for the expedition in which he was soon to act so prominent a part. Gideon did not undertake the work of subduing the Midianites until he had first effected a religious reform among his people. The first blow in the contest that was coming on must be against Baal worship. Then the Lord would strike a blow against Midian. Gideon's obedience was prompt though attended by personal danger. He destroyed Baal's altar before he built an altar to God.

II. From the yoke of Midian. The work to which Gideon was called was no common task. His response to the call ripened his task into power, resolve and fruitfulness. He renounced all pretense to any superiority. Duty was his, results were with God. In asking a sign from heaven Gideon sought strength to enable him to keep his resolution. Gideon feared himself, his own unfitness and unworthiness, feared in the awful presence of God. His altar was a memorial to his faith, his hope, his gratitude. When peace had filled his heart he called his altar Jehovah-shalom. Deeper in his own spirit than any desire for warlike honor, there was a yearning after peace for Israel which could come only as they returned to Jehovah their God. Upon the top of that same rock where he had erected his altar and where the angel of the covenant had met him, and where the miracle had been wrought, and which had become the place of divine revelation to Gideon, he was directed to build God's altar and offer sacrifice thereon. Then came his trumpet call to Israel. Then Israel recognized in him, who had braved Baal's revenge, their champion, and deliverer from the yoke of the Midianites. The spirit of patriotism waxed strong upon the renunciation of idolatry. It was an instance of childlike confidence in that "mighty man of valor" when his faith was weak to turn at once to the Lord for a new revelation. It pleased the Lord to accommodate himself to Gideon's infirmity, and allow him to prove his promise to give him triumph over the Midianites. A certainty that he was moving in divine order enabled Gideon to think less of the difficulties he should meet in the management of his undertaking. Israel's weakness could not cause failure with God. He was set for the accomplishment of the divine purpose.

Billy's "Comeback."

He was the son of a worthy manufacturer and had just returned from abroad. His father, a brusque, matter of fact man surveyed his offspring, who was togged out in the latest London fashion, with distinct disapproval. "Young man," he blurted out, "you look like an idiot."

Just at that moment and before the youth had time to make a fitting reply a friend walked in.

"Why, hello, Billy! By George, how much you resemble your father!"

"So he's been telling me," said Billy quietly.—Boston Transcript.

He shines in the second rank who is eclipsed in the first.—Corneille.

Was All Run Down WITH HEART TROUBLE AND NERVOUSNESS.

When the heart does not do its work properly and the nerves become unstrung the whole system becomes weak and run down, and needs building up before you can feel it again.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills will do this for you.

Mr. Hugh Mosher, Chester Basin, N.S., writes:—"Just a few lines to let you know what Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills have done for me. I have suffered greatly with heart trouble and nervousness, and was all run down. I used lots of medicine, but received no benefit until I was advised to try your pills, and also used to one box I finished the next box I felt so much better I got [illegible] and was well and strong. [illegible] medicine I have [illegible]. I cannot praise them too highly. I recommend them to anyone suffering from heart trouble."

"Well, Father Can Play"

Yes, better than he ever thought possible! All the years that he has spent unable to play have been storing up a great fund of memories, and now that the

New Scale
Williams Player Piano

with the wonderful Meister-Touch Action has set his musical heart free from his untrained fingers, he finds himself able to give wonderful expression to whatever he plays.

He can play "Rule Britannia" or the "Marseillaise" with so much vigor and go that one's feet start marching whether or no, and to every other kind of music he brings the same genuine understanding of latent talent.

This superb instrument is the very finest example of player-piano making. Its tone—its control of time and melody—its appearance—all are unexcelled.

DO NOT PLUNGE

The plunger generally loses heavily in the end. True, the man who never takes a chance seldom becomes wealthy, but it is equally true that the steady, thoughtful man, who weighs each important move carefully before making it, never goes bankrupt and generally keeps considerably ahead of the game, be it farming or other business. Just now there is a great tendency for the farmer to neglect live-stock and operations and plunge into grain growing, particularly wheat. Wheat and coarser grains are high in price and the war may force them even higher, but conditions do not warrant the growing of wheat to the total exclusion of live-stock and other branches of farming, for nothing is surer than that wheat must come down when conditions become normal again, and the drop will be sudden and disastrous to the man who depends on wheat alone. Besides all are agreed that to keep land in a high state of fertility and in that tilth which ensures big yield it is necessary to practice mixed farming and rotation crops. "Some stock on every farm" should be our ideal. A prominent man in Western Canada affairs says this of his country. It is even more true of the Eastern and Central Provinces. It might safely be exchanged to "more stock on every farm." Men are farming not for one year, not for five or ten years but for a lifetime, and they, if they are good farmers, desire to leave the land to their children in better tilth and more fertile than when they started on it. If so, do not plung. We once knew a man who plunged every year. One year it would be all wheat, another year all clover or alfalfa, another year all sugar beets and so on, and the unhappy experimenter always happened to hit a year of crop failure in his particular line, or a year of extremely low prices which scarcely afford him a living. His chances were costly, and while his neighbors enjoyed the prosperity which came of steady progress in mixed farming with several branches to fall back upon, he stood still or went backward. It is a good time to distribute effort over a wide field in agricultural endeavor.

AFTER THE WAR

It may be as well to catch our hare before we cook it, but it is only human nature to look forward to what will happen when the Allies have conquered a glorious peace. We expect to see a great deal of territory added to the British Empire, and perhaps a considerable indemnity exacted, which will help pay off Canada's national debt, now increasing at the rate of $200,000 a day. But we are even more interested in knowing whether, after the war, the Dominion will get the vast immigration from England and the large financial accommodations she enjoyed before the war.

Some people argue that the demand for capital and labor in continental Europe will be so acute that few emigrants and little money will find their way to the Western world. But this position is combatted by Mr. John Moody, editor of Moody's Magazine, who points out that continental Europe will be too impoverished to do much in a financial way for a long time, and that British capital will seek investment at very low rates of interest in Canada and other countries on this continent. Moreover, the return of two million men from military to civil life will so demoralize the British labor market that we may confidently anticipate an enormous army of immigration from the British Isles.

STOCK EXCHANGE OPENED.

The London Stock Exchange reopened on Monday after having been closed five months because of the war situation. The opening was marked with an enormous attendance. Before the formal opening a proclamation was made the members gathered in front of the desks, cheered, then united in singing "God Save the King."

CHRISTMAS AT TOBERMORY.

For a few days previous to the festal day the members of our guard were busy in their spare time decorating our main barracks room with holly bunting, tissue paper decorations such as bells and streamers and a copy of the regimental crest and many suitable mottos and on the whole we made it extremely presentable. On Xmas eve our shift was off duty, and we held a little concert to which we invited a few from the village and the operators at the wireless station and their families. We had a very fine program considering that we had no piano by which an accompanist could aid the singers. The program consisted of songs, choruses and recitations and Capt. Clark acted as chairman. Everything went off smoothly and there was not a dead number in the whole program. Perhaps the numbers which brought down the most applause, that is if any come in for more than others, were the songs Tipperary and Tickle Me Timothy by Private C. Donlon and Asleep in the Deep and Stop Your Tickling Jock by Pte. Diss, while a solo Go to Sea, by Mr. Lightbown, and a duet by Mr. and Mrs. Lightbown entitled Mona, was simply fine, a violin and mouth-organ selection by Pte. K. Butley and W. Edit, the songs Ship Ahoy and One Touch of Nature Makes the Whole World Kin by Pte. Harrington a sketch entitled Black and Tan Comedy by the colored artists Corporal Spicer and your humble scribe and a recitation The Telegraph Operator also by the latter all came in for their share of applause too. The artist though, who fairly copped the lumps, was Pte. Britton who sang the comic songs The Art of Mesmerisme, I'm Getting Ready for my Mother-in-law and Poonamon, he certainly could get away them in a most humorous way. After the program there were some presentations. Since the Detachment have been here we have received many favors from a few of the residents among whom are Mr. and Mrs. Mathieson of the boarding house, Mr. and Mrs. Argue and Mr. and Mrs. Lightbown of the Marconi station. the former were presented by Capt. Clark, on behalf of the detachment, with a handsome five piece silver tea set with the tray suitably engraved the latter couples were each presented by the detachment with a silver fern pot. Sergt. Camp, on behalf of the non-com officers and privates, presented Capt. Clark with a handsome set of solid gold cuff links, tie pin and tie clip with his initials engraved on them, and Corporal Spicer on behalf of our guard, presented Sergt. Camp with a box of cigars. All the recipients made suitable speeches thanking us for the gifts. The evening was brought to a close with Auld Lang Syne and the National Anthem. On Christmas day we had a fine spread for dinner, and our cook out-stripped himself with his marvels of the culinary art. After dinner Capt. Clark passed around cigars. As we had no fatigue duty on that day we were able to do as we liked inside the camp limits, most of the time, however, was spent reading the mail which had got in very late the previous evening and opening Xmas boxes from home. So you see that altho we were all away from home, some for the first time, we certainly had a Merry Xmas and one that we will long remember.—Wiarton Canadian-Echo.

HIS HEALTH IN A TERRIBLE STATE
"Fruit-a-tives" Healed His Kidneys and Cured Him
HAGERSVILLE, ONT., AUG. 26th. 1913.
"About two years ago, I found my health in a very bad state. My Kidneys were not doing their work and I was all run down in condition. I felt the need of some good remedy, and having seen "Fruit-a-tives" advertised, I decided to try them. Their effect, I found more than satisfactory.
Their action was mild and the result all that could be expected.
My Kidneys resumed their normal action after I had taken upwards of a dozen boxes, and I regained my old-time vitality. Today, I am enjoying the best health I have ever had".

A despatch from London:—There is such a rush of recruits for the third contingent that only the very finest are being accepted. Many young men who came long distances to join are keenly disappointed at being turned down.

Dr. Gillies received a letter this week from his brother, Dr. Ernest Gillies at Salisbury Plains. He says that the bayonets have all been freshly sharpened and the first aid requirements put in shape. This would indicate that an early departure for the front is probable.—Teeswater News.

ABOUT AUCTION SALES.

The man who holds an auction sale is liable to hesitate at going the additional expense of $1.00 or $1.50 for having the entire list inserted in the local paper. The fact that the entire list is in this way placed in the hands of very reader of the paper so that he can peruse it item by item at his home renders it of great value to the person holding an Auction Sale.

CHESLEY TAKES TROPHY.

The same old luck. Twice we have won the Bowman trophy and twice we have dropped it like a hot pancake. Chesley won by 11-4, tucked the mug carefully under their goal keeper's arm and made for home. The rink was packed. The game was clean and no accidents. Port Elgin lads showed much steam in the first period and in the last ten minutes, but were unequal to the strain in the centre period. Chesley had a star goal-keeper in Watts, and he was no horseshoe man, either, but a keen, heady stopper. Port will improve in combination now sure, for it cost them the game last night.—Port Elgin Times. Walkerton boys are getting in shape and may decide to bring the trophy here. If so, it will be much easier for the Port Elgin boys to come to Walkerton and try to get it back, than to have to drive to Chesley.

LOCAL OPTION IS GOOD.

In a letter to the Midland papers in the course of the local option campaign just closed in that town. Mr. James Playfair states that should local option in that town be defeated, he would, as far as possible transfer his business interest elsewhere. He is moved to take the stand by his experience as a large employer of labor and knows of the good effect upon the men by the closing of the bars. Not only is Mr. Playfair engaged in the manufacturing business but he is interested in the largest mercantile establishment in Midland and his interest in steamship companies has in recent years made that town the headquarters for many steamers. Therefore he is in a position to view the question from every side. Evidently there are many more in Midland who have the same opinion as Mr. Playfair for the repeal by-law was defeated last Monday by a vote of 714 to 322.

Some object to even giving a little towards the various war funds, but if the Germans were in power here workmen would have to give a day's pay per month, while others must pay two or three per cent of their earnings.

Kincardine is a pretty live place in spite of the fact that there are a few merchants here who do not advertise, but who find fault with people for dealing with Toronto houses that do advertise.—Kincardine Review.

Peterboro, with a population of about 20,000, subscribed $60,000 to the Canadian Patriotic fund in three days. We have heard some men in this district tell how the Patriotic fund had plenty just at this time. It may be true, but it is hardly the proper spirit to make that excuse for not giving. Before the war is ended the Patriotic treasury will be quite empty.

"Business as Usual" for this year, says the Brantford Expositor. Don't get cold feet or listen to the blue ruin artist. The worst days of the war have passed, the panicky stage is over and there should be a gradual improvement from now on. Business will be just what you make it. Close attention to detail, a little more energy and the net results will be much as usual.

The verdict against Hyatt, who was recently tried by the Police Magistrate M[illegible], for seducing a young girl in Amabel has caused quite a discussion in the press, and many of the papers wonder why the confinement in goal was not made longer. This was entirely to the fact that the accused has a wife and two children dependent upon him. In the opinion of The Echo he should have received the lash, but it is sure a long term of imprisonment would have inflicted a great deal of hardship on his wife and small children.

CHESLEY WINS TROPHY.

On Tuesday Chesley's N. H. L. senior team journeyed to Port Elgin and defeated the fast septette of the town by a score of 12 to 3, winning the Bowman trophy. The game was a keen contest in the first and third divisions. The play was clean and no accidents occurred.—Chesley Enterprise.

STENOGRAPHER TO THE COLONEL.

Pte. George Crane, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Crane, 8th Ave. E., who is with the Second Contingent at Exhibition camp, Toronto, has been appointed the official stenographer to Colonel Allan, of the 20th Battalion, of which the 31st representatives form a part. Mr. Crane's ability in office work was given a try-out last week and his appointment is a decided promotion, as he will probably be stationed with the officials at headquarters when the contingent reaches the front. —Owen Sound Sun.—Young Crane is well known in Walkerton.

HEPWORTH'S CLOSE VOTE.

The exact vote on the local option by-law in Hepworth was 52 for and [illegible] against. The by-law was lost by four-fifths of a vote. On Tuesday the ballots were gone over again but without any change and the result will not likely be affected, unless the Ontario Government sees fit to step in and cancel the license, on the strength of the very close vote, Hepworth has evidently made up its mind to get rid of the bar again and in any event the next vote taken on the question will no doubt be favorable to local option.

THE GUILTY MAN.

On Thursday collector Kidd went up to Dr. Crow's office and collected $15 of arrears for water rates and $1.65 for a water motor attached to a washing machine, in his house, making $16.65 in all. The tap in Dr. Crow's office was installed before Mr. Kidd became collector of water rates. On Nomination night Dr. Crow claimed to know a party who had not paid his water rates for years, and, of course, subsequent events have proven that he knew what he was talking about.—Chesley Enterprise. P. S. How about Walkerton arrears.

FLOUR SHIPPED TO BELGIUM.

The donation of two thousand bags of flour which the county of Grey made to the relief work for victims of the war in Belgium is now on the way to Halifax and will be shipped to Belgium as expeditiously as possible. The committee, which was appointed by the County Council to purchase the flour composed of Warden Breese, and Messrs. E. Lemon and John Legate, bought the flour and shipped it on January 2nd. The flour was purchased in lots of four hundred bags each, one lot being purchased at Owen Sound, one at Hanover, one at Durham, one at Meaford and one at Thornbury and Clarksburg, two hundred bags being bought at each of the latter places.

RIVERSDALE

Mr. Jas. Halliday has returned home after a pleasant visit with members of his family and friends in different parts of Grey County.

Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Chatron entertained quite a number of their friends on New Years' Day. Amongst the visitors being Mr. Chatron's sister Susan of London, Ont.

Mr. and Mrs Wm Macdonald and two grand-daughters spent New Year's day at Glen Douglas farm, Culross Township, with Mrs. Macdonald's brother, Alex Campbell and also other members of the family tree.

Our old friend Thos Symons is getting tired of keeping bach and has serious matrimonial intentions. But owing to the busy time looking after and caring for the stock and also the unfavorable weather and roads, he is greatly handicapped in his courting desires. In this connection it might be well to remember some other men keeping "bach" to at least emulate Tom's good intentions.

Mrs. Frank Anderson and two daughters of Oakville, Ont., are visiting the formers parents Mr. and Mrs. Wm Macdonald and other relatives.

On New Year's Day Mr. and Mrs. Archie McKinnon entertained a large number of visitors. All present being relatives or members of the family tree. Amongst the number present were:—Mr and Mrs John McKinnon, Walkerton, Mr and Mrs Thomas Cunningham and family, Walkerton. Mr and Mrs Robert Smith and family, Walkerton, Mr and Mrs Fred Glebe and family, Hanover. Mr and Mrs John Harley and daughter, Hanover. Mr and Mrs Neil McKinnon and family, Greenock, Mr and Mrs John H McKinnon and daughter Culross, Mr Archie McKinnon's grandfather was one of the pioneers in this locality. Himself and his son's Neil, John, Hugh and Donald all settled in the woods and cut out homes. All are deceased leaving families to take their places on the farms that were chopped and cleared by them. Also two daughters, Mrs. Archie McLean and Mrs Francis Anderson and their husbands located on bush farms here at the same time. Hence this reunion of relatives met on this occasion are members of the third, fourth and fifth generation of the said John McKinnon. Vocal and instrumental music furnished part of the pleasure for those present. It is needless to dilate on the table, as Mrs. McKinnon is an adept in the culinary art. She arranged a table for the little folks at which presided one of the male members of the family tree, who, in a short address stated that he had supped with all five generations.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

MORE V. C'S.

Drummer Spencer John Bent (1st Battalion East Lancs. Regt.) for conspicuous gallantry near Le Gheer on the night of Nov. 1st and 2nd, when after his officer, platoon sergeant and section commander had been struck down, he took command, and with great presence of mind and coolness succeeded in holding the position. Drummer Bent had previously distinguished himself on two occasions, on 2 2and 23 of October, by bringing up ammunition under a heavy shell and rifle fire and again on November 3rd, when he brought into cover some wounded men who were lying exposed in the open.

Lce.-Cpl. Frederick Wm. Dobson (2nd Battalion Coldstream Guards) for conspicuous gallantry at Chavanne (Aisne), on September 28, in bringing into cover, on two occasions, under a heavy fire, wounded men who were lying exposed in the open.

The "London Gazette" contains an announcement, that the King-Emperor has been pleased to approve the grant of the Victoria Cross to Naik Darwah Sing Negi, of the 1st Battalion 39th Garhwal Rifles, and to Sepoy Khudadad, of the 129th Duke of Connaught's Own Baluchis.

The V. C. was, in the former case, formally bestowed by the King during his recent visit to France.

The deeds for which the men are rewarded are:

Naik Darwal Sing Negi, for great gallantry on the night of November 23, 24, near Festubert, France, when the regiment was engaged in retaking and clearing the enemy out of our trenches, and although wounded in two places in the head and also in the arm, being one of the first to push round each successive traverse in the face of severe fire from bombs and rifles at the closest range.

Sepoy Khudadad, displayed conspicuous gallantry on October 31st, at Hollebeke, Belgium. The British officer in charge of the detachment having been wounded and the other gun put out of action by a shell, Sepoy Khudadad, through himself wounded, remained working his gun until all the other five men of the gun detachment had been killed.

BRITISH TRADE.

The trade returns for the eleven moths of the year show that imports, after the first fall at the beginning of the war, are steadily increasing, but exports, which showed a rise in October, fell sharply again last month. Compared with November 1913 the imports of foodstuffs increased £5,688,-663.

IMPORTS.

November	£ 55,987,058
Increased over October	4,427,769
Decrease from Nov. 1913	12,480,017
Eleven months this year	629,245,300
Decrease from 1913	67,974,635

EXPORTS.

November	£ 24,601,619
December from Oct	4,00,196
December from Nov. 1913	20,154,969
Eleven months this year	403,951,797
December from 1913	78,162,890

Raw imports fell by £12,290,951, cotton being responsible for £8,919,229; coal and coke were responsible for a £2,085,477 decrease in exports; and in manufactured articles there was a drop of £4,902,190 in cotton fabrics, £1,533,168 in wool fabrics, £1,987,589 in iron and steel manufactures, and £1,569,633 in machinery.

ANNIHILATING DISTANCE.

The "Autocar" tells a story which is interesting, but how impossible it would have seemed, say at the time of the South African War. An airman at the front was wounded while flying, and when he came down the doctors ordered him at once to hospital. But as they did not specify any particular hospital, he said to another airman, "Will you take me over to England on your machine? I think the hospitals here are crowded and I could get better well away from the sound of guns." So in he got, and in a few hours he was in a Kentish hospital. De Wet had been captured because of the power of a motor. Without it he might have been at large as in years gone by. But this seems trivial in comparison with a flight to hospital across the English Channel

SOLDIER'S KINDNESS.

The kindness of the soldiers to the poor is proverbial.

A member of the Canadian contingent in a Strand restaurant had just ordered 'a steak smothered in onions,' the other evening, when he was accosted by an elderly man, who produced a paper which he requested him to read. The Canadian read the document through carefully and said, "Well, what do you want?" "I am an old soldier down on my luck," said the man. "An old soldier down on your luck, are you? Well, could you do a hot feed?" The man required no second invitation, and more than relished the plate of meat so generously provided for him.

RECRUIT'S 14-SIZE BOOT.

The Ulster division of Lord Kitchener's Army has many men six feet and over, and more than one-half of the division has a chest measurement of 38 to 45 inches.

One of them is Sergeant J. Bryan Stewart, of the 11th Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers, who claims to be the biggest man in the British army. His measurements are: chest (tunic) 57, waist (tunic) 61½, collar size 19½, cap size 7⅝, boots size 11, height 6 feet 1 inches, weight 21 stone. Another recruit, a lad, is 6 feet 6½ inches in height, wears 14-size boots, 16½ size collar, and a 25-inch cap

NOTES.

Over 1,000 miles of double-width khaki have been manufactured by the woollen and worsted looms of Huddersfield and Colne Valley during the past three months.

The death rate in the 97 great towns of England and Wales last week averaged 15.3 per 1,000.

A verdict of "Death from natural causes" was returned at an inquest held at the Sheffield Coroner's Court on Squire Bottomley, 75, of 16 Jubilee road, who died suddenly on a Corporation motor-bus proceeding from Lodge Moor to Manchester road.

Mr. Gordon Harpur Morley, son of Mr. Launcelot A. Morley, Registrar of Births and Deaths, and the old Wednesday cricketer, has been gazetted second lieutenant in the 4th Battalion Shropshire Light Infantry. He was educated at Wesley Grammar School and St. John's College, Cambridge.

Mr. Thomas Kirkby, of Gleadless, has now four sons serving in the forces of the country. The oldest, Pte. T. Kirkby, of the West Yorkshires, is in France; Pte. H. Kirkby and Gunner Fred Kirkby, of the York and Lancaster and Royal Artillery, respectively, are in camp; while W. Kirkby has just joined the West Yorkshires.

Bert Fenton, 24, laborer, 7 St. John's avenue, Laughton, was admitted of Rotherham hospital on Saturday week and died shortly afterwards. He had been run over by a train in the sidings at Dinnington main colliery, his legs being badly injured.

Rev. A. H. M. Hope, assistant priest at St. Mark's, Mansfield, for the last seven years, has accepted the living of Egmanton, Tuxford, which is in the gift of the Society for the Maintenance of the Faith.

Up to the present time twenty men have gone from Bamford to serve their country in the war. Two are in active service, and the others are in training.

Through the efforts of Canon Hayward the men of Bamford have sent to the headquarters of the Red Cross Society 20 lbs. of tobacco and 10,000 cigarettes.

Two iron merchants were remanded at Glasgow, each on £2,000 bail, on a charge of trading with the enemy.

On the ground that she herself had been guilty of misconduct, the decree nisi granted to Mrs. Helena Powell against her husband, an actor, was rescinded in the divorce court.

Sentence of eight weeks' imprisonment has been passed on Harold Wearing, who was tried by a court-martial at Falmouth for spreading a report that German warships were in St. Ives Bay.

Tried by court-martial at Toulon in connection with the loss of torpedo-boats 317 and 318 by collision, Second Lieut. Veun, says Reuter, has been acquitted, and Chief Petty Officer Tristani has been found guilty through lack of judgment.

News reached Bristol that during the recent visit of the King to the front His Majesty inspected the 1st Battalion Gloucestershire Regiment, which has been in the thick of the fighting. The King decorated Pte. George Law, of Bristol, with the Distinguished Conduct Medal for bringing in a wounded sentry under heavy fire. Pte. Orr, of Bristol, who was with Law, has been similarly decorated.

Following a disturbance in the canteen, a large number of shots were fired from a hut at a camp near Upwey, Dorsetshire, and Pte. Wallace Williams, of the 3rd Dorset Regiment, was killed, and another private injured.

Brigadier-General Hill, commanding the troops in the Dublin district, prohibited the manufacture or sale of fire-arms, ammunition, or explosives in the metropolitan area. Shot guns and sporting cartridges may be sold as usual, and the sale of other fire-arms and ammunition will be allowed when the consent of the Brigadier-General is obtained.

With time-honored ceremony Dr. Dickin was elected Mayor of Brightlingsea, Essex, in the belfry of the parish church.

The death from pleurisy took place at Radlett of Mr. Fred Knee, secretary of the London Trades Council and various other London labor committees.

A marriage with a prisoner as the bridegroom took place at Kirkcaldy police station. The bridegroom was James Duncan, miner, who had been charged with deserting from the Black Watch and remanded pending the arrival of an escort. The bride was Miss Cecilia Crawford. Invitations had been issued for the wedding to take place on Hogmanay, but fearing that this would be impossible, the couple were anxious to be married immediately. The provost, Sir Robert Lockhart, performed the ceremony, after which the bridegroom was taken back to the cell.

Leicester is on the crest of a wave of prosperity. "Never has Leicester enjoyed such a trade boom," was the description of one man who has a finger on the pulse of employment in the town. Orders for army supplies have been pouring into Leicester's hosiery and boot-making factories, and, as early delivery is imperative, all Leicester's resources are strained to keep pace with the demands of the world's armies.

Lord Moulton, at a meeting in Manchester, said that English dependence on German aniline dyes had seriously affected certain English industries. The meeting unanimously approved the establishment of a national company for the manufacture of synthetic colors and dyes. The Government had offered conditionally to guarantee interest on £1,500,000 debenture capital. England, it was stated, consumes £2,000,000 worth of dyes yearly in an industry worth £200,000,000.

The death occurred at Lower Watlingham, Surrey, of Lady Sherbrooke widow of the first Lord Sherbrooke who as Robert Lowe proposed to tax matches when Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1871. This led to rioting. Lady Sherbrooke, on hearing in November, that her nephew had been killed in action, was seized with paralysis from which she never recovered.

The appointment of Sir D. Brynmor Jones, M. P. for Swansea, to a Mastership in Lunacy, has caused a parliamentary vacancy. Either Mr. C. F. G. Masterman or Mr. T. J. Williams, a tinplate maker, will be selected by the Liberals STICKS TO OLD METHODS.

(New York Sun.)

Of all the back number things war is the most obstinate. It sticks to old methods despite all modern improvements. The bayonet gets up to date [illegible] at defiance, the cavalryman resists all the efforts of theorists to send him to the rear; now it is announced that the usual old spy holds his own against the aeroplane. "England's "Eye-witness" backs him up as the one reliable means of finding out what the enemy's commanders really have in view. There is one advantage in these survivals. Something of the traditional picturesque element is preserved to tell of quality the heroism of the struggle.

YOUNG MURRAY JONES, WORKING AT HIS LARGE MODEL HOUSE, WHICH WAS PRONOUNCED A PERFECT PIECE OF WORKMANSHIP BY HIS INSTRUCTORS.

Denver, Col.—When he was only 18 years of age, young Murray Jones, of this city, left school to take a position paying him $120 a month!

That was his reward for having taken pleasure in patiently training himself to work with hands!

Young Jones had the advantage of attending the Denver Trades school, where he was taught carpentry and building. But, according to his instructors, it was more the boy's own enthusiasm for 'doing things with his hands' than his training school, which made him an earner of big wages instead of a mere apprentice, so early in his life.

Jones left school in August. The city of Denver gave him a job at once on the elaborate decorations for the big Knights Templars convention, and his craftsmanship proved far superior to that of experienced carpenters who worked beside him.

The lad is now engaged in a skilled position at good wages in a planing mill in Caspar, Wyo. "He's going to get to the top of his trade in quick time," say his employers, "as a result of the habits of putting his whole soul into his work, which he acquired by his interesting experiments in his own little workshops."

Jones' amateur masterpiece was a complete wooden house which he designed and built on the scale of 3 inches to a foot. It took the boy only four months of work in leisure hours to complete the big model, which is a marvel of intricate, painstaking craftsmanship.

THE MINE SWEEPERS OF THE NORTH SEA

War has brought with it a new task to the drifters and trawlers. Their ordinary calling is perilous enough, for the North Sea is a water full of traps and danger. Its currents and shallows, its October gales and November fogs, have often tried the courage and resourcefulness of those who try to extract a livelihood from its depths. But the clearing away of mines is a far more dangerous task. Germany has proved herself a mistress of the furtive and nefarious arts of warfare. She sows the open sea with mines regardless of the danger entailed upon inoffensive seafarers who carry good between neutral ports or trawl for fish. It is one of her principles that considerations of humanity are subordinate to her personal interest. Without the mine sweeper, the North Sea just now would not be navigable. Fortunately, the North Sea fisherman is equipped better than anybody else to undertake the task. His knowledge of the sea is the accumulation of generations. Along the coast from Wick and Thurso to Yarmouth and Lowestoft there are communities of deep-sea fishermen who know every rock and sandbank and shallow. As boys they have climbed the rigging of boats at the quay, and gone with their fathers in search of herring and cod, assuming at a very early time of life a share of the work. Of recent years they have been compelled by the introduction of trawling machinery, to give up the simpler methods of their forefathers and join themselves to trawlers, but they have carried to the new work those qualities of hardihood and readiness in times of danger bred in them from battling with wind and wave. The men are of the same hard stuff as their ancestors, although their occupation is changed. The open air, with its breezes and rain and sunshine, has tanned them brown. Constant meeting with danger has given them self-reliance and the courage engendered by sea-faring is joined to steadiness and caution. Lean, active and alert, they are never seen to greater advantage than when faced with danger and difficulty. And they have the sailor's happy temperament, his jolly breezy way of doing the hardest things with a laugh. In a word, they present to us in its most attractive form the old type of sea-dog characteristic of this Empire.

The very exceptional services they are called upon to perform at the present moment ought to ensure a hearty response to the appeal issued on their behalf by Princess Louis of Battenberg. Their case can be easily understood. We are approaching those days when wild weather is expected to prevail in the North Sea, and it cannot reasonably be expected that the Germans will do other than increase their mine-laying during the winter months. Such work as theirs is most conveniently performed in darkness or even fog. Their mine-layers would probably fare the elements much more cheerfully than British guns. What facilities Germany may possess for carrying on the practice it is impossible for us to know. The naval authorities have no doubt been able to check the practice by taking trawlers with them to watch for those who sow these mines under a neutral flag. It was a happy thought that induced them to obtain the co-operation of the deep-sea fishermen in doing this as the latter are very quick to recognize the difference between an English and a foreign trawler, whatever flag may be flown. But with an enemy like Germany it is never wise to count on having stopped the most evil of her practices. If one method fails, she will do her utmost to devise another, and it is as clear as can be that her plan of campaign includes as an essential point the gradual weakening of the British navy by the use of mines and submarines. The German battleships are not meant to venture out until our navy has been weakened by the destruction of individual ships in this way. Therefore the mine sweepers will have an abundance of work during the months on which we have entered. They have an extremely large area to deal with. It has generally been recognized that a country at war is justified in using mines only under conditions that have been very clearly defined. But the Germans have initiated the practice of scattering them broadcast, and thus have increased the work of the sweepers. Luckily for our fleet, drifters and trawlers could scarcely have had better preparation than their own work for the dangerous task on which they are now employed. The trawlers work in pairs, equipped with a trawling gear made for the purpose. It somewhat resembles their usual nets, only it is made of hundreds of yards of steel wire. This is weighted so as to carry it down to the proper depth, and it is dragged along by two steam trawlers, catches the moorings of the mine and brings it to the surface. The danger comes from the fact that the mine, after being dragged a little way, very often explodes, and even when it comes to the surface it can only be delt with by a warship, which explodes it.

The drifters use nets, a number of which are fastened together and spread out by the boats. They are very effective, and cover a great deal of water in a short time; but here, too, the danger is extremely great. In sufficient trouble is taken with the moorings of the mines, with the result that occasionally they drift away from their original position and sometimes come together in a bunch, which is liable to explode by one bumping against another in bad weather.

No praise can be too great for the fishermen who have volunteered for this service. Men have been called up on the Naval Reserve, and still it has been shown that among those left behind are numbers of daring, handy and resourceful men who are able to search the seas for mines as successfully as they used to do for fish. But although these men are employed by the Admiralty during the war, they are not, technically speaking, members of the fleet. At any rate, they do not participate in that gratuitous clothing which the seamen receive, and the appeal made by Princess Louis is in order to do for them what the naval authorities do for those who are in the regular navy; that is to say, provide them with the clothing which work in the open sea during the winter months renders necessary. When it is taken into account that these men have been successful in drawing up and exploding many hundreds of mines, it will be conceded that what they have done deserves the gratitude of the country, and especially of shippers and those who have financial interests in sea-borne traffic.

It is impossible to drop this subject without some reference to the action of our British naval authorities. They have resolved, and most properly, to use mines in self-defence. The difference between them and the German Government is, however, very striking. The Government of the Kaiser started mine laying in the most outrageous manner at the beginning of the war. In accordance with the teaching of van Bernhardi and other military experts, they unscrupulously used the mine for purposes of offence, openly exulting in the hope that by this means they would be able to cripple and ultimately destroy the British navy. We were using mines only after the war had lasted two months, and after the serious losses which we and neutral countries have suffered rendered it imperative that some effective means of defence against this weapon should be adopted. In the next place our naval authorities issued public warning before beginning to lay mines, so that ships might avoid the dangerous area. They are sowing British mines only as a defence against German mines and submarines.—Country Life.

SMALL TELEGRAPH BATTERY BOYS CAN MAKE; EXPERT TELLS HOW

The above diagram shows how simply a gravity battery may be constructed. Try to make use of a jar of the type here shown.

The electric battery was the first device invented to produce a continuous electric current. The best way you can understand a little about the mysterious power you are working with in these experiments is to make a gravity battery yourself. The one here described will give a steady current of about one volt. A series of several of them would run a short amateur telegraph line.

Materials: A glass jar (Mason jar will do if you cannot get one like that shown in the cut); a strip of copper one and one half inches wide by fifteen inches long; a piece of No. 14 copper wire two feet long; two binding posts (buy them at the electrical supply house); a circular piece of zinc an inch thick and four inches in diameter (from the plumber); a piece of wood one-half inch thick, a little longer than the jar is across, and two and one-half inches wide, a soldering iron (40 cents at the hardware store); some acid, a sheets and three pounds of copper sulphate (10 cent at the drug store).

Begin by removing the insulation for about two inches at each end of the No. 14 wire. Scrape the wire clean with a knife and then solder one end to an end of the copper strip. Then coil the copper up as shown in cut. Pound out an end of the other piece of copper wire until it is broad and flat. With a sharp nail a small hole may then be made in the flat wire end and a similar hole in the zinc, and a rivet used to rivet the wire end to the zinc. Cover this point with a drop of paraffin.

Drill a small hole through the centre of the board and screw the binding posts to it at each end, first bringing the cleaned ends of the two wires up and hooking them about the screws. The affair will then look as in the illustration. The zinc must not be lowered nearer than three and one-half inches to the copper.

Now pour the blue, glossy lumps of copper sulphate into the jar. Fill it with rain water or melted snow until the zinc is just covered. Connect a copper wire from one binding post to the other, and leave for about two hours. Then remove this piece of wire.

The cell will now be working right and there will be a blue solution in the bottom of the jar and a clear one on the top, the dividing line being between the zinc and copper.

INGENIOUS BOOKKEEPING.

How Doctors May Have Banks Keep Track of Their Business.

"The Medical Record quotes from a writer in the British Medical Journal who suggests that physicians should make banks serve as their bookkeepers. Sir John Collie is the author of this system. His plan is to keep two banking accounts at the same bank.

"The first, No. 1," says the writer, "is his ordinary current account, into which he should pay all the money he receives, whether he has been paid in cash or cheques. It is an excellent rule never to spend a penny which has not come to one through his banking account. The physician should never get cheques which have been paid to him cashed by the local tradesmen. He should never pay his chauffeur with his fees. Every single item received from the physician's practice from one year's end to another should go through his banking account No. 1. If the physician has been tempted to cash a five dollar bill which some one has paid him unexpectedly on a round, or if he has bought stamps with the money which some patient left at the office, then he should draw a cheque for the amount, cash it and pay the money into his bank. Thus, and thus only can he make his banker his bookkeeper.

"If the physician should die suddenly or wish to sell his practice, then, and then only, whether his other business books are kept well or not, the lawyer or the medical agency or the purchaser who wades through his effects will rejoice to find one method of knowing gross receipts and getting some idea of the real intrinsic value of the business, and will from the physician's bank book alone tell the total cash receipts from the practice upon which to found the purchase price.

"At the end of every year the books should be balanced, and if the doctor cannot balance them himself, he has not the time the comparatively small sum which a professional accountant will charge, say $5 or $10, will be well repaid."

Sheridan's Retort.

Pitt had answered a speech of Sheridan's and complained when the latter proposed to rejoin that Sheridan always wanted the last word.

"Not at all," said Sheridan, instantly withdrawing his request to be heard, "I am content with having had the last argument."

The Prince of Wales At Oxford

The war cut short many things. Amongst them it cut short the Prince of Wales' Oxford time. He was to have returned for yet one more term, and added something further to his education, to his studies, to his sports, to his Oxford friendships and memories. It would have been very pleasant for Oxford and for his college and for himself. He would have mingled with yet a third generation of young Oxford Englishmen as happily as he has mingled with two

But this was not to be. The Prince, and this is what he would have wished, has suffered the common lot of his compeers. Like two-thirds and more of the men with whom he was up, like ever so many 'second year' men of 1914, he was swept off into the service of his country, and his second year at Oxford has proved his last. It is the more fortunate that he has given these two years uninterruptedly and to the full. Those who knew him well, who remember his advent, and saw him often throughout his course will agree that few undergraduates, taking things all round, could have got more, if so much, out of two fast-fleeting years. The Prince arrived, at a little over 18, well forward in the studies and training of the Navy—naval, physical, and intellectual—but naturally somewhat newer to, and less directly prepared for, university life and studies than the Public School boy.

"PAR INTER PARES."

In a very few weeks, however, he began to find his feet and developed rapidly. From the first he took his own line, with usual modesty and firmness, determined in his own mind that he would be really par inter pares, that he would seek and accept no tribute, except on his merits, that he would take as habitual and as much trouble to avoid deference or preference at others take to cultivate it, desiring, as the old Roman poet put it, "that men should give what be wanted, but that they should be free to deny". Quodque dari volult, volult sibi pause negari. His natural dignity and charm, and it should be added, the good sense and good feeling of his college companions, and of Oxford generally, that democratic aristocracy, enabled him to go far in this resolve without mishap or untoward result. Once having started upon it, he pursued this narrow, sober line with increased confidence, until it seemed the most easy and natural and unconscious thing in the world.

Some sacrifice had to be made. He saw very little of the seniors in the university, and was little seen by them except by those with whom he came officially in contact. He did no want to spend any time at all, even a little, in being treated as prince. But all the more he made a wide acquaintance with a great variety of juniors. Neither his equerry, Major the Hon William Cadogan, whose soldier's death will place Oxford in mourning, and in whom Magdalen College loses one who had become an intimate and personal friend, nor his tutor, Mr. H. P. Hansell, stood in the way of this. Indeed, they only helped him to it. His rooms were more and more open to his friends and to his friends' friends. He went in turn to scores of rooms of other men

GAMES AND SPORTS

He played football, lawn tenis, golf, tenis, and squash rackets; he motored; he ran with the college beats, he ran a great deal with the beagles, he shot at various country houses round Oxford; he rode, for exercise, and to hounds. In this last accomplishment he started at a disadvantage; but by real perseverance and pluck soon made up for it and became quite proficient, though among one of the genuine losses involved by the loss of another winter at Oxford is the missing of yet further days with the Oxford hunts. He was withal a punctual and diligent member, in the ranks of the O. T. C. He drilled, he marched, he went into camp like any other private.

As to his set studies, his time was short. It was not clear at first that he would have the second year: the career for which he was to prepare was a unique one: strict educational "economy" had to be practised. French, German and English, especially the comand of literary expression in his own language, were necessary for him. History, political economy, political science and constitutional law were desirable.

SIR WM. ANSON'S INFLUENCE

For this last study he was singularly fortunate in having at hand one of the first living authorities, and perhaps the first living teacher, in the late Sir William Anson. Young himself in mind and body to the last, a country gentleman and sportsman, as well as a great jurist and publicist, and singularly happy in his relations with undergraduates, Sir William Anson at once put the Prince at his ease, and there sprung up between them an friendship which grew and strengthened every term. Together, beginning with the British system, they went through the constitutions of the world, it out from China to Peru, yet literally from Switzerland to Japan, the Prince reading and writing and taking notes, Sir William talking and expounding. His "hour with the warden" was a pleasure to which he looked forward every week, and it was indeed a singular coincidence and piece of good fortune that the removal of this friend and teacher, sad and sudden as it was, did not occur until just before the end of the Prince's undergraduate time.

LECTURES AND TUTORS.

Side by side with this, the Prince attended lectures on history, on political economy, and on political science. He also had many special hours of instruction with the university teachers of French and German, Mr. Berthon, the university lecturer in French and Prof. Fiedler, the professor of German. He further went for special tuition in history to Mr. C. Grant Robertson and Mr. A. L. Smith, the college tutors in that subject, and once every week he wrote an English essay for the president. Lectures he chiefly attended in the earlier part of his career. More and more as time went on he found that he preferred the Oxford system of private and individual tuition in which the pupil writes or prepares work and his work is criticised, and he is "catechised" orally by his tutor, to the system of the larger general lectures. He found that he learned more, and more quickly, under the first method, and, indeed, that is the usual experience of Oxford students, and is the raison d'etre of the "tutorial classes" which have recently been added with such remarkable effect to the old extension lectures for workingmen. It is interesting to find that Prince and workingman as pupils are at one on this point. He learned, as J. K. Stephen says in his poem, first "to write and then to read," and then, it may be added, to write again, for both arts go together. Like other writers, young and old, he soon found that he could write best about a subject for which he really cared, and also that when he cared for a subject he could make it more truly his own by writing about it.

It is interesting to note how his command of all three languages proceeded together, and how he acquired a sense of literary style, as regards both arrangement and form, in both English and French, at much the same rate. His essays, which at first were conscientious reproductions and compilations, became more and more his own, both in thought and expression. In the end, though not yet 20 and only at the age when many sixth form boys are just beginning Oxford, he acquired a considerable mastery. Gifted with a good verbal memory, a freshness of view, and decided independence of character, his essays, if not exactly literary, became more and more interesting, and again and again were striking and eloquent, if only in their genuine sincerity and simply honesty.

THE PRINCE'S QUALITIES.

Bookish he will never be, not a "Penuclerk," still less a "British Solomon." Kings, perhaps fortunately, seldom are this last. That is not to be desired, but the Prince of Wales will not want for power of ready and forcible presentation, either in speech or writing. And all the time he was learning more and more every day of men, gauging character, watching its play getting to know what Englishmen are like, both individually and still more in the mass.

Oxford might then have given him a little more. The cumulative influence of her studies and her life might have deepened still further, but she has given him essentially what she had to give. He leaves her, if young, already able to be, what England expects him to be, a force and a factor in national life. If the role of Princes in a constitutional country is to guide rather than dominate, to persuade rather than to compel, to influence by the attraction of character and personality, and the example of the chivalry of modern days, and of duty, steadfastly and eagerly if unostentatiously pursued, he stands on the threshold of life to-day wanting neither in national gifts nor in such preparation in its more modern form as it has been the privilege of England's ancient and historic schools and seminaries of "true religion and useful learning" from age to age to confer upon each succeeding generation of her sons.

YOU SHOULD BE AFRAID OF A COUGH OR COLD.

Coughs and colds do not call for a minute recital of symptoms as they are well known to everyone, but their dangers are not so well known. All the most serious affections of the throat, the lungs and the bronchial tubes are, in the beginning, but coughs and colds.

Many people when they contract a slight cold do not pay any attention to it, thinking perhaps that it will pass away in a day or two. The upshot is that before they know it, it has settled on their lungs.

Too much stress cannot be laid on the fact that on the first sign of a cough or cold it must be gotten rid of immediately, as failure to do this may cause years of suffering from serious lung trouble.

DR. WOOD'S

will cure the cough or cold and prove a preventative from all throat and lung troubles, such as bronchitis, pneumonia and consumption.

Mrs. B. E. Bruce, Brighton, Ont., writes: "I am sending you my testimony of your Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, telling you what it did for my little girl. The doctor had given her up as she was, as we thought, going into a decline with the cough she had. I was told by a lady friend to try 'Dr. Wood's' and when she had taken two bottles she was on her feet again, and four bottles cured her."

Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup is the best cure for coughs and colds. It is put up in a yellow wrapper; three pine trees the trade mark; the price, 25c and 50c; manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Clearing Themselves.

Among the many means adopted for expressing grief upon the demise of a relative perhaps an interesting a one as any is that met with in the neighborhood of the Tully river, in Queensland. Here two, three or four of the deceased friends or relatives will squat close together, with heads on each other's shoulders, bewailing for hours at a time the loss of the dear departed. It is not the virtues of the latter that are in any way extolled, however. What these mourners are really taking pains to do is to show that they and the deceased were always good friends. Their object in all this is to prove to the outside public that they have had nothing to do with the encompassing of the death.—Wide

The Right Foot Foremost.

Putting the right foot foremost was an old Roman ordination originally regulating the entry of persons into a house or other building and based upon the superstition that the left was unlucky. A boy was kept at the door to see that no one entered the house "left foot first." The phrase quoted is thus seen to be very ancient.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills stimulate the sluggish liver, clean the coated tongue, sweeten the obnoxious breath, clean away all waste and poisonous matter from the system, and prevent as well as cure all complaints arising from a liver which has become sluggish.

Mr. Victor D. McNeills, Sandstone, Alta., writes: "I thought I would write and tell you of my experience with Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, as I am greatly pleased with the results I received by using them. I was troubled with sick headache for a long time, and would get so every night after I ate my dinner that I could not do any work. A friend of mine, from Toronto, visited me last summer and he asked me to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. He told me they had done him so much good for his stomach. I used several vials, and I found they did me so much good that I can recommend them to any one suffering from liver trouble."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are vial. 5 vials for $1.00, at all d mailed direct on receipt of price T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toro

THAT AWFUL ACHE OF LUMBAGO RUBBED AWAY FOR ALL TIME

RUB ON NERVILINE

Lumbago is a peculiar sort of rheumatic trouble that affects the muscles about the loins and back. At times its agony is intense. Severe spasms of pain shoot in all directions, and become more severe on stooping.

In treating lumbago or stitch in the back, it is necessary to keep warmly covered to prevent a sudden chill. Attend to this, and then apply Nerviline freely.

Quick as a wink you feel the stiffness lessening. You realise that a powerful, pain-subsiding remedy is curing the pain, is easing your distress, is making you well again.

Nerviline quickly cures backache and lumbago because it has the strength, the power and penetrating force possessed by no other known remedy. Its amazing curative action is due to certain extracts and juices of rare herbs and roots, combined by a secret process, and forming a truly magical medical marvel.

Any sort of aches in the muscles and joints Nerviline will cure quickly. It eats the pain right up—relieves stiffness, restores the muscles to their wonted elasticity and vigor.

THE ART OF CHURNING.

The flavor and aroma of butter depend very largely on the ripening of the cream. Ripening of cream also improves the churnability of the cream and increases the keeping quality of the butter. Ripening means souring or preparing the cream for churning. It is brought about by the development of lactic acid, which is a by-product resulting from the growth of certain species of bacteria, commonly called lactic acid bacteria. These bacteria are normal milk and cream, and their presence is necessary to the development of desirable flavors in butter, says W. S. Cunningham, of the New Mexico Agricultural Station.

The temperature at which cream ripens best is between 60 and 70 degrees Fahr. A lower temperature than this will produce a bitter cream, while higher temperatures are likely to produce foul flavors.

It is a common practice among farmers to use a little buttermilk from one churning as a starter for the next batch of cream. This is the easiest way of providing a starter, and if the buttermilk is good it is very satisfactory. However, if one is having trouble with poor flavors and difficult churning, a more satisfactory starter is to save four or five bottles of clean milk and allow them to sour naturally at 60 to 70 degrees Fahr., until firmly coagulated. Then taste the contents of each bottle and use that which has the cleanest and pleasantest acid flavor for a mother starter. By adding this starter to a large amount of milk, enough can be made to sour any amount of cream. A starter is simply a quantity of milk containing a preponderance of desirable germs. It should be added to cream at the rate of 2 to 10 per cent. of the cream, at least 12 hours before churning.

Stir cream frequently to insure even ripening, and to prevent the curd from settling to the bottom and becoming lumpy. Do not add fresh, warm cream to the older cream. Let it cool first. Sweet cream should not be added to your cream less than 12 hours before churning, as it will not ripen even with the older cream, and will thus cause a large loss of butter fat in the buttermilk.

For making butter of good body or texture, a churn without any internal dashes or paddles should be used. The swing and barrel churns give good satisfaction. The churn should be scalded and cooled with water to prevent the cream from sticking to the sides.

The proper temperature for churning varies at different times of the year with character of feed, with period of lactation and breed of cows. As a rule, the temperature should be about 60 degrees in winter and 56 degrees in summer, and the cream should be held at these temperatures for at least an hour before churning. If the cream is too warm, the butter will come soft and salvy. It will have poor keeping quality and there will be a large loss of fat in the buttermilk. If the cream is too cold it will froth and stick to the churn. It is well to have the temperature so that churning may be accomplished in [illegible] to 20 minutes and the butter come in firm condition. A dairy thermometer should be used in controlling the temperature.

The cream should be strained into the churn to remove any hardened curd. Do not fill the churn more than one-third full, as more will lessen the agitation. If color is to be added, it should be put in the cream after it is in the churn and before the churn is started. The amount to add varies from none to about an ounce per hundred pounds of butter, depending on the market, season of the year and breed of cow. The churning should proceed in a manner to secure the greatest agitation. If a tight churn is used, it should be opened two or three times to allow the gas to escape. Stop the churn when the granules have reached the size of wheat grains. If the butter is churned into balls, buttermilk will be incorporated and the butter will deteriorate quickly.

Draw off the buttermilk and add as much water to the butter as there was cream to begin with. The wash water should be of about the same temperature as the buttermilk, although if the butter is soft, it may be cooler, to firm the butter. Revolve the churn a few times before removing the water. The purpose of the wash water is to remove the buttermilk and thereby improve the keeping quality of the butter.

Salt serves both to flavor and preserve the butter. Different markets require different amounts of salt. Under average conditions, six-tenths of an ounce of salt to a pound of butter should be used.

Butter is worked to distribute the salt uniformly, to remove excess buttermilk and water, and to give the butter a compact, waxy body or texture. It may be worked in a bowl with a ladle or with one of the lever workers. Over-working causes it to have an oily or salvy texture and occasionally a fishy flavor. Under-working causes a leaky and mottled butter of loose texture. Butter should be cool at time of working.

Butter should be printed or molded, preferably in rectangular shape, and wrapped in parchment paper. If a fancy market is desired, it is well to put the butter in special cartons, which have printed on them the name of the farm or of the brand of butter, together with statements as to the purity of the product. The style or neatness of the package helps to sell the butter.

The difference between slop and swill for hog feed is mainly one of quality. Water polluted with unhealthy refuse is merely swill, but slop is a mixture of good feeds and good fluids free from putridity.

Many recommend sheep for feeding in orchards rather than swine. They leave no safe cover for insects to breed, and will keep the orchard healthy and the trees manured.

To toughen horses' shoulders it is advised to use two ounces of hemlock bark and two ounces of oak bark for one gallon of vinegar. Put in it the alum that will dissolve. Apply the solution to the horse's shoulders for four or five days before the work commences in the spring, and your horses will have no more sore shoulders, provided the collars are correctly fitted.

The difference between good farming and poor farming is demonstrated by the condition of the buildings. On the farms where the buildings are in good repair you will find good crops and choice herds of cattle and flocks of sheep.

There have been various types of milking machines on the market for upward of 10 years; but they are far from coming into general use, even on up-to-date dairy farms. It is evident that the demand for a reliable economical mechanical milking machine is unfilled.

If every man would work his own farm as he has to work when helping the neighbor haying, the country would be a good deal neater, a good deal more tempting to all concerned. Work when work is called for; rest when it rains. Besides there is a Sunday every week.

X-RAY EFFECTS.

Same Cause Produces Stimulation and Destruction.

It has been shown by experiments conducted in Germany by Dr. Schwartz that so far as their action on plant life and living tissue is concerned the X-ray have both a stimulating and a destructive effect, and results being controlled by the length of the exposure. The proper time appeared to be 150 seconds, and shortly after exposure to the rays the plants were so much stimulated that in three weeks' time they had grown to double the height of the other specimens.

Such experiments were made with the use of young sprouts, and not upon plants in an advanced state of growth. An exposure of 30 seconds has no appreciable effect of any kind upon the growth, and on the contrary, a long exposure of five minutes is seen to alter the tissues and hinder the growth of the plant.

As to the effect on the tissues of the human body, he found that in the case of wounds where there is a decrease in vitality of structure this is stimulated to quite a degree, so that, for instance, an obstinate wound will heal up after a few days. It is well known that the X-rays will produce severe lesions upon the skin, but this is caused by a too strong action.

THE STORRS CONTEST.

The total production for the sixth week of the Storrs, Conn., egg-laying contest amounted to 1,634, an increased yield of 174 eggs as compared with the preceding week and relatively 461 eggs better than for the corresponding week last year. The heavier breeds, including the Rocks, Reds, Wyandottes, Dominiques, Sussex, Faverolles, Orpingtons and Favorite Hens, constitute 53 per cent. of the birds engaged in the contest, but up to this time they have yielded only 47½ per cent. of the eggs. On the other hand, the lighter breeds, including the Leghorns, Campines and Buttercups, constitute 47 per cent. of the birds in the competition, and have yielded 57½ per cent. of the eggs to date.

Ed. Cam's pen of White Wyandottes from Houghton, England, again won first place for the week, with a production of 12 eggs. A New Haven pen of White Leghorns, owned by N. M. Hendryx, secured second place, with a yield of 40 eggs. A Storrs experimental pen of White Leghorns was third with 37 eggs for the week, and a New Hampshire pen of Rhode Island Reds, owned by Colonial farm, followed closely with 36 eggs for the same period.

Some interesting changes occurred in the leading pens during the week. Windsweep Farm's pen of Leghorns from Redding Ridge, Conn., which have stood first since the contest opened, are now supplanted by Cam's English White Wyandottes. Another pen of White Leghorns from Windham, N. Y., which has been among the ten leading pens, is now supplanted by a pen of Rhode Island Reds from Temple, N. H. The ten leading pens to date are as follows:

THE NECESSARY CARE.

To produce eggs, a hen must have plenty of water, and as she has no teeth, needs grit to grind the food after it passes into the gizzard—animal food, vegetables, and lime in some form. Brooks and outside drinking troughs are sure to be frozen in winter, and sand likewise. So when the farmer throws down corn, which is greedily eaten, the hen profits little, for she cannot digest it properly, and in consequence is unprofitable. Insects (the natural animal food supply) are not to be had, nor is there any vegetable matter available. So the fowls return to natural conditions, which means no eggs until springtime, when they are again able to find the different ingredients from which eggs are formed. The real poultryman knows that it pays to provide the hen with these things when she cannot find them for herself.

During the last two years I have almost entirely changed my plans for feeding the laying hens, and find the new methods much better than the old. Instead of a wet mash at 9 o'clock in the morning, I now give the following dry mash in the afternoon at 2: Ten pounds wheat bran, ten pounds of ground oats, ten pounds ground corn, ten pounds white middlings, ten pounds old process oil meal and ten pounds freshly cut green bone. If you can't get freshly cut green bone, use twenty pounds of any one of the commercial brands of animal food specially prepared for poultry. Mix the above quantities thoroughly, and keep in a barrel for daily use.—The Poultry Yard, in Woman's World for January.

NOTES.

That the Single-comb Buff Orpington is fast coming to the front no one versed in poultry will dispute. They are good layers and growers when properly handled.

Utility is the solid foundation on which the beginner must start his poultry operations. This does not mean the purchase of scrub, or culls, labeled utility, but from any breeder who has standard-bred poultry with a good performing record behind them. A strain that means something and if given half a chance will produce in the hands of the buyer.

In a few months the hatching season will be on. The beginner has been taught the first few lessons and preparations will be made both better and earlier for the 1915 crop of chicks. The experienced poultry operator has already laid his plans and with him everything will be in order to make a good start. No untried methods are used by this class of poultry keepers, and a fair measure of success is always attained.

When the poultry judge hears at the big shows noted breeders disagreeing as to color or shape of the breed they have raised, he does not feel called upon to explain why he cannot always agree with them. And his judgment from time to time, show after show, is in the main right. Any judge can, and at times does, make a mistake. So does a bookkeeper, but generally speaking the awards are placed pretty nearly correct.

The dollar sign should not be the only aim of the exhibitor. Too many times the great desire to win just from the money and advertising standpoint, has led, otherwise good fellows, to be poor sports, and to condemn judges many times unjustly. To be a poor loser gains one nothing in the end. Most exhibitors are mighty good judges of their own fowls, and when in competition fail to see the merits of the other exhibitors' fowls. Keep the vision clear and if on the losing side go back on the plant and plan for better fowls next year. If the breeder looks through smoked glasses, seldom will that kind reach the top of the ladder.

To make a liquid rouge, take thirty grams of carmania; ammonia fluid, one ounce, and rose water four ounces. Mix.

To remove spots from furniture, mix equal parts of alcohol, olive oil, and pure cider vinegar. Shake it well for five minutes to mix evenly and apply with a soft cloth. Wipe with another cloth and polish with woollen cloth.

Don't throw away an old umbrella, but enamel the frame white and use for an extra clothes hanger. Suspend the frame by the handle and hang small articles on it. It will rust nothing after it is enameled.

If potatoes are placed at once in boiling water with a little milk and salt added, it will prevent their turning dark.

To remove indelible ink, soak in strong salt water and rinse in ammonia water. Repeat process till all ink is removed.

In making peach ice cream, add a few drops of almond flavoring and it will be delicious.

Great saving can be effected in the use of metal polish if it is mixed with paraffin oil. A tin of polish and about four egg cupfuls of the oil shaken together will last for months, besides being much cleaner to use.

Varnished paint can be kept bright by soaking in water a bag filled with flaxseed, and then using the bag as a cloth to wipe off the paint.

To preserve fruit jar rubbers cover with dry flour. When wanted, the flour can readily be wiped off with a dry cloth, and the rubbers will be good as new. Any rubber goods can be preserved for years in this way.

The next evening the dog found its way back to the surgery, and as soon as the door was opened jumped on to the operating table and waited till the "vet" could attend to it. For many evenings after, punctually at 8 o'clock, it visited the surgery and submitted to the process and then went home.

A farmer took a horse from an island to the mainland three miles by boat, worked it all day, and let it loose. The next morning he was surprised to find the horse grazing near his stable, though still very wet.

A tame pigeon used to accompany a boy to school a distance of one and a half miles, remain during lessons, and return with the boy.

A gray cat was taken by train over 60 miles and yet returned home in a few days; one walked a distance of 133 miles, and another walked no less than 282½ miles in four weeks.

CARGILL

A most enjoyable entertainment was given in aid of the Belgians in the Foresters hall here on Friday evening last in aid of the Belgian fund. The first part of the programe was a comedy in one act "War Times", excellently presented by a caste of local amateurs, this was followed by readings cleverly and vividly depicting scenes from the late battle of the Meuse, and the camp scene which was next on the programe was a very effective tableau, by the side of a fire and surrounded by clusters of trees were bivouacked representative of the defenders of our country softly humming songs of home and their loved ones far away while in the background a British sentry paced back and forth back and forth, his bayonet glowing red in the light of the camp fire, the chorus of the British Marines "presented arms" with admirable precision when the Union Jack was swung across the foreground of the scene, "Rule Brittania" followed by songs of the Royal Navy were rendered with a spirit worthy the real "Jack Tars. Against a background of this grouped flags of the Allies, the National Anthems were sung by uniformed representatives of each. The British anthem last of all, and the evening ended with three hearty cheers for the King. A capacity audience greeted the performers. The handsome sum of $100.00 was realized besides a donation of $5.00 by Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Hettrick. The management wishes to thank most heartily everyone who co-operated with them in their efforts to make the evening a success.

Mr A. J. Bennet and family moved to St. Thomas on Tuesday where we underst and Mr. Bennet is entering into business for himself.

the other things planned by the council was the extension of the water main in the west ward, which was necessary, before the residents of that section would have an efficient service This extension would also give a double line down town, which in case of emergency would be valuable as at present, should a bad break occur in the one main, the emergency pump at Truax's mill would alone have to be relied upon.

In connection with the water-works system it is proposed to drill another well at the pumping house in order to secure a larger supply of water. A new electric pump is also being installed there. This pump has a capacity of 400 gallons per minute.

With regard to road work, Yonge St. to the Carrick road will be graded and receive special attention. The roads in town will probably be oiled as last year. Additional sidewalks will also be built.

It is proposed to put a by-law before the ratepayers in the near future for the purpose of making the extension of the waterworks system in the West ward and raise debentures to pay for that work and also for the amount of $[illegible] which is required to pay the town's share of the cost of the West end bridge. This is almost necessary for if the council attempted to pay this amount from taxes and general revenue it would mean a tax rate of 35 mills.

WHAT THE MEN NEED

Many people in Ontario who are anxious to send articles to the Canadian soldiers at Salisbury are repeatedly asking "What are the men in need of and what would they appreciate?" An answer to this comes in a letter from Captain Arthur McNally, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. McNally of Brant, where in answer to the query he says:—

> "If you want to send things that the men really need, you can send no more scarfs, mitts and gloves. The men have all been issued with sleeping bags and cardigan jackets by the government. Remember when you make gloves or mitts, the men must be able to use the forefinger at least."

Capt. McNally also intimates that as socks and handkerchiefs wear out quickly, these articles are always very acceptable and appreciated by the men as well as the above.

DEFEATED IN PORT ELGIN.

The Mildmay hockey team was defeated by Port Elgin in a league hockey match played in Port Elgin on Monday evening by a score of 8-1. This defeat will probably take some of the swelling from the heads of the "Flying Dutchmen", and the worst has not yet come.

GAVE ALL HE HAD.

In the last three verses of the 12th Chapter of St. Mark. The Master commended the poor widow for her much giving. In Chesley in the last week of 1914 a little six-year-old boy had five dollars in the Savings Bank gave all that he had to buy a barrel of flour for the Belgians and a barrel will keep two starving Belgians alive all winter. The boy's name is Burdette McNeil and we would ask all our exchanges to repeat the story of the sacrifice of a Chesley boy who has a heart that can feel for another's woe.—Chesley Enterprise.

The History of the County of Bruce

And of The

Minor Municipalities Therein

(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)

Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps, Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

HE'S ONLY A KID.

At last the editor of the Mildmay Gazette has thrown off his mask and appeared in his true light—he is merely a kid. Citizens of this town were always in a quandary to know the why and the wherefore of the Gazette's persistent raillery about Walkerton and everything pertaining thereto and the secret was revealed on Thursday last when the Gazette man appeared on the line-up of the Mildmay hockey team of youngsters under eighteen years which opposed the High School II. team in a strenuous game in that burg. Now that the Gazette man has dubbed himself a kid, Walkertonians will be content to let him rave on as long as the youngster is kept amused. Will some one be kind enough to contribute a rattle and perhaps he will then cease his incessant bawling.

GOING IN THIRD.

Capt. G. H. D. Martyn manager of the Canada Spool & Bobbin Co'y will be an officer of the Bruce Regt. in the Third Contingent. Mr. Albert Earwaker has signed up as quarter-master for Capt. Martyn and will accompany him.

HAD TOES CRUSHED

While working about the tool-house at the town hall, on Friday, Mr. Jno. Smith, street inspector, had the misfortune to have the scraper, which is used in levelling the snow on the sidewalks, fall on his right foot, badly crushing two of his toes. Mr. Smith will as a result of his mishap be off work for several days.

BURIED AT CARGILL

The death occurred in London on Sunday January 17th, of Elizabeth Thompson, aged 42 years, of Cargill. The remains were forwarded to that town for burial on Monday afternoon Mrs. Thompson is survived by her husband and four children. The funeral will be held on Wednesday afternoon.

SIGNED FOR THIRD

Besides Messrs Joe Wallace and Robt. Turner mentioned in our last issue, the following local boys returned on Saturday from Tobermory where they have been doing guard duty, to join the local corps of the third contingent which is mobilizing here:—Vic Bell, Geo. Weidner, Joe Farrell, Frank Taggart and Percy Jenkins.

MAKES ASSIGNMENT

Mr. J. Pleskey, general merchant, who has been conducting the business formerly conducted by Mr. James Whitehead, made an assignment to the latter on Saturday last. Mr. Pleskey claims that the recent failure of one of his debtors in Toronto put him in financial difficulties and is assuring all his creditors that he expects to be able to make settlement at one-hundred cents on the dollars.

SOLDIER'S AID TEA ROOM.

Citizens are reminded that the Soldiers Aid Tea Room which is being conducted by a number of young ladies is open every Wednesday afternoon and evening. A number of ladies have recently given teas at the tea-room and the room is open to all for this purpose. The young ladies have raised a considerable sum of money in this way and whenever possible purchases of homemade baking etc. should be made at the tea-room.

ZEPPELINS RAID BRITAIN

The most important despatch received from the war zone during the past two weeks was that bringing news which was received yesterday of a Zeppelin raid on English towns. The raid was made during the night of Tuesday and a great deal of damage was done in the five towns which were attacked. Among other things the raiders attempted to blow up the country residence of the Royal Family at Sandringham. The attempt however was futile and even had it been successful it would have been of little consequence the Royal Family had returned to Buckingham palace some days previous.

NO CHANGE AT MALCOLM POLL

In reporting the recount of the ballots cast in the recent election for the reeveship of Brant, last week we stated that one ballot at the Malcolm Poll had been added in favor of Mr. McCallum. This we have since been informed was untrue and in justice to Mr. O'Neill, the Deputy Returning Officer, we state that his first return was correct and the recount of the ballots at his poll made no change. This being the case, the recount demanded by Mr. McCallum proved beneficial, in a certain degree to Reeve Nesbitt as it increased his majority to two.

DIED IN PORT ELGIN

The death occurred at Port Elgin on Thursday last of a former resident of this district in the person of Mr. Alex. McDonald The remains were brought to Greenock for burial, the funeral taking place on Saturday, from his son Daniel's residence, to Purdy's cemetery where interment was made. The deceased is survived by three daughters Mrs. Moulton, Port Elgin; Mrs. Wm. Percy, Kinlough, and Mrs. Neil McKay, Kincardine, and two sons, W. J., of Kincardine and Dan. of Greenock. Mrs. Legget and Miss McDonald, of Hepworth, formerly of Walkerton, are sisters of the deceased.

DEATH OF MRS. TINDALE.

Death in a very sudden nature came to Catherine Young, relict of the late Rev. Wm. Tindall at her home on Victoria St., on Monday evening last, heart-failure causing her death while seated in a chair, shortly after having eaten her evening meal. The late Mrs. Tindall who was 81 years of age has been a resident of Walkerton for many years and was highly respected by all who knew her and her sudden demise is regretted by all. She is survived by one daughter Mrs. Ross of Windsor, who was with her at the time of her death. The funeral took place to the Walkerton Cemetery on Wednesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock.

ENGAGEMENT ANNOUNCED

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hildstein of Formosa, announce the engagement of their daughter, Genevieve M., to Mr. Anthony J. Klein, the marriage to take place in St. Mary's church, Formosa, on Tuesday, February 2nd.

McPHERSON—FREEMAN.

A very pretty wedding was solemnized on Wednesday, Jan. 20th at high noon at the home of the bride's parents when Olive May youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jos. Freeman was united in marriage to Mr. W. G. McPherson. Rev. Thos. Wilson officiating. The bride who was unattended wore a gown of charmeuse veiled with ninon with pearl trimming and carried a boquet of bridal roses. The young couple, left on the afternoon C.P.R. train for Toronto and other points previous to taking up their abode at West Monkton, Ont.

CHARGE DISMISSED.

Wm. Cumberland who was charged with fraudulently collecting money for the Patriotic Fund, appeared for a second hearing before Magistrate Tolton on Friday last. No additional evidence of any important nature was produced by the crown and as it was in no instance proven that he had received money, the magistrate considered that he had been punished quite sufficiently for the attempt by his one week in goal, and dismissed the case. In dismissing the case he warned Cumberland against further collecting and the latter assured the court that at no time had he collected funds in a fraudulent manner and as to the future, he would attempt to collect no more funds.

A DESPISABLE TRICK.

One of the most despisable tricks which have been perpetrated recently came to light last week when a man who held a grievance against a former neighbor placed him and his wife on the Indian List. This was without doubt spite work on the part of this man as it transpired that neither of the parties placed on the list have at any time conducted themselves in such a manner as to warrant their names being placed there and the woman in the case has never partaken of the flowing bowl. On learning of the wrong which has been done him the chagrin which the man felt was almost unbearable and on complaining to the authorities he was instructed to communicate with the department at Toronto. Surely this man has some way of securing recompense for the great wrong which has been done not only to him but more particularly to his wife.

BORN

Von Hatten — In Walkerton on Thursday January 14th, to Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Von Hatten, a daughter.

MARRIED

Vogan—Russell. — In Toronto, on Monday January 11th, Mr. Ray Vogan of Walkerton, to Miss Jean Russell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robt. Russell of Walkerton. Mr. Vogan has rented a part of Mrs. McKillop's residence on Jackson St., and will reside there.

Cross—Gough.—On Tuesday January 12th, at the home of the bride's parents at Napier, Ont., Mr. H. W. Cross of Young Sask., son of Mr. and Mrs. Robt. Cross, formerly of Walkerton, to Miss Irene Lilian Gough, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ogle Gough.

Hill—Condy.—In Greenock on Wednesday, January 20th, 1915, Mr. Alfred Roy Hill to Miss Alice Condy daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Condy of Greenock

HOCKEY MATCH

The Mildmay hockey team will play an N. H. L. match with the local aggregation here on Friday night of this week. The Mildmayites are coming here determined to win this game from the blue-and-white and it will be the best game of the season. Turn out and cheer the "Colts" to victory over their old-time opponents, the "Dutchmen". Game called at 8.15 sharp.

ROOM FOR MANY MORE

The County of Bruce has been asked for 150 men for the third contingent, and recruiting is now in progress in Walkerton and will continue until Jan. 25th, unless the number should be forthcoming before that date. A good number have already volunteered, but there is still room for many more, any young man who is desirous of serving his Country, should lose no time in coming to the Armouries, as recruiting must close on the above date. Do not be backward in coming forward, there will be plenty of room for you. Parents should encourage, not discourage, their boys from serving their Country. Pay commences from date of enlistment. —W. J. Douglass, Lt. Col., Recruiting Officer.

A CO-OPERATIVE STORE

Walkerton is to have a co-operative store to assist in reducing the high cost of living. The Householders Co-Operative Stores Limited of Toronto, a concern chartered by the Ontario Government with a capital stock of $400,000 and who now have a chain of stores running successfully in Toronto are now prepared to open up branches in outside districts, they have appointed Mr. Wm. Bish to organize a branch here. He will start at once to appoint a provisional advisory board and treasurer to handle the funds for subscribers, upon which the company will pay a good interest as well as profit-dividends every three months. The company will also undertake to sell produce of all kinds on the Toronto markets for its members, without charge. This will be a decided advantage to the farmers.

AN INTERESTING CASE.

A case of interest to farmers and fruit growers was heard at the court house on Monday afternoon before Judge Klein. It was a case in which McGregor & Pritchard, fruit growers were suing for an injunction to compel Mr. Nicholas Schmidt their neighbor, who is also a fruit grower, to cut or trim the limbs of a number of cherry trees which had been planted on the dividing line of the two properties and the limbs having extended over their property, were, the plaintiff alleged interfering with traffic on a road which passes along the fence at that point and it was to compel the removal of this obstruction for which they entered suit. Considerable evidence was heard from both sides and Judge Klein adjourned the case until Wednesday of next week, January 27th.

SUCCESSFUL ENTERTAINMENT.

The C.O.F. entertainment and ball which was held in the town hall on Friday last in aid of the Red Cross Fund was most successful in every way. The program was all that could have been desired, each and every number being will received and applauded by the packed hall. The numbers on the program deserving of special mention were, the recitations by Miss Nesbitt and Miss Jean Norrish, the solos by Mr A. S. Royce and the the recitations by Mr. Clarke of the Bank of Commerce staff. Mr. Clarke is an artist in elocution and his recitations added greatly to the evening's program. Mayor Lippert occupied the chair in his usual able manner. At conclusion of the program, lunch was served to everyone in the hall after which some sixty couples participated in a most enjoyable dance. The proceeds of the evening over expenses amounted to over $40, which amount has been paid over to the Red Cross Society.

ANNUAL MEETING OF I.O.D.E.

Though it is not yet five months since the Walkerton Chapter was organized much has been accomplished. The sum of $551.00 has been received by the Treasurer. Of the money expended $50 was sent to the Belgian Relief Fund, $15 was spent in providing Christmas cheer for families in town and $225 in purchasing materials for hospital supplies and soldiers' comforts. Four shipments have been made to the Red Cross Society and to the Camps, among the materials being 108 yards bandages, 101 shirts and 202 pairs of socks, besides wristlets, cholera bands, night-shirts, helmets, scarfs, bed quilts, etc. The members wish to thank the people of the town and community for their generous assistance and would mention especially the Dunkeld school, the Soldiers' Aid Tea room, St. Thomas Sunday School, Rev. Mr. Wilson and the ladies of Cargill. They wish to acknowledge also the courtesy of the editors of the local papers, of Captain Klein and of Sergeant Pengelly. They extend a cordial invitation to all the women of the community to attend the meetings held for work, in the Armouries each Tuesday evening at 7.30 and Friday afternoon at 2.30.

FINED $25 AND COSTS.

As a sequel to the case we reported last week in which Mr. Jno. W. Becker of Carrick was fined $10 and costs for being drunk while on the prohibitory list, Mr. Wm Russell, proprietor of the American Hotel, Neustadt, appeared before magistrate Telford in Hanover on Thursday last and on pleading guilty to the charge of supplying the liquor to Becker, was fined $25 and costs. The charge against Russell was laid as a result of the investigation of Mr. Jos. White the local license inspector.

FOR THE WARDENSHIP.

Our Reeve A. E. McNab is out this year for the Wardenship of Bruce County. As a Reeve of Walkerton has never been honored with the position, it seems to be about due for the County fathers to pass the honor this way. Alex has been in the County Council now for a number of years and has been returned Reeve by acclamation during the past three years something unheard of in the municipal life of Walkerton. He has occupied almost all the responsible positions in the County Council except the Wardenship and has served the County faithfully and with ability during the time he has been our representative there and is easily ranked as the foremost member of the County Council. No doubt he has also, with his legal training saved the County considerable sums of money. We think he has fairly earned the right to be the County's next Warden and here's hoping he lands the prize.

HOCKEY

In the return N.H.L. hockey match played in Southampton last Friday. Walkerton defeated Southampton by a score of 10 to 4. Although it was predicted that the locals would win, it was not expected that they would do so in such a decisive manner and the one-sided score in their favor was a surprise not only to their opponents, but also to their supporters here, to say nothing of the effect it had upon the Mildmay septette and their fans. During the first half the game was a close one, the half-time score being 4-1 but the second period proved disastrous for Southampton six goals being registered against them while LaFrance in goal for Walkerton got everything that came his way.

Poor old Mildmay! The championship honors which were flaunted before the people of that burg by the editor of the Gazette two months ago, have faded into obscurity, and the team is now prepared to lie down and die. The game Friday night will put them under the sod completely and Walkerton hockey fans will no doubt willingly supply all the crepe necessary for the mourning Mildmayites.

. Port Elgin defeated Mildmay on Thursday last by 11-9. Thirty minutes overtime was necessary to decide a winner.

Cheer up Mildmay, the worst is yet to come.

Mildmay plays here Friday. This will be the game of the season.

Another illustration of the enmity which Mildmay bears towards Walkerton came to light during the past week when it was learned that the officials of the hockey team which represents that town had protested to the N.H.L. against the local team playing Roy Oberle who is employed in Formosa. The Mildmay club are jealous of Walkerton's successes and in thus attempting to demoralize the local team are evincing considerable swelheadedness. Suffice it to say that they gained nothing by their protest and Roy will as usual be seen on the line-up on Friday night.

	Won	Last	To Play
Walkerton	2	0	4
Port Elgin	2	1	3
Southampton	1	2	3
Mildmay	0	2	4

The Walkerton High School Juniors journeyed to Mildmay on Friday evening last, they were defeated 4-1 by an older and larger team. Godfrey of the Mildmay Northern League team and Schefter, the celebrated editor of the Mildmay Gazette appeared on their line-up. The return game has not yet been arranged.

On Saturday afternoon the fast Hanover junior Y. M. C. A. septette were defeated here 5-4 by the local juniors after fifteen minutes of overtime. The game was evenly contested throughout. The teams line-up as follows:—

Hanover		Walkerton
N. Helwig	goal	H. O'Brecht
K. Knechtel	1st defence	F. Moore
E. Logie	2nd "	M. Wilson
H. Boettger	rover	O. Schefter

TRUE TO HIS RACE

"Oh, Lord Wellrose," murmured Susan, in a very low tone, and blushing deeply. "I hope you will forgive me for venturing to make such an assertion, but I must not hesitate to say anything that may serve to deepen your interest in poor Benny. Lord Wellrose, poor Benjamin Hurst, humble as he is, may be your own poor kinsman."

"Impossible!" broke impulsively from the lips of the astonished young man. Then, in a quieter tone, he asked:

"What makes you think so, dearest?"

"Oh, in the first place, the strong likeness! If you were dressed alike, strangers might take you for twins," said Susan.

The young earl smiled slightly, as he said:

"The likeness is undeniable. But do you not know that such likenesses have been found to exist even between persons of different nationalities?"

"Yes, my lord; but I fancy that in every case there must have been some blood relationship, however distant, or even unknown. But the likeness between you, my lord, and my poor friend Benny, is not the only reason I have for believing that he may be your lordship's poor kinsman."

"Then what more, dearest?"

"Lord Wellrose, Benjamin was not the child of the woman whose name he bears, and who brought him up as her own. He was a deserted child, of unknown parentage. All that is known of him is that: That he was born in or near Seton Castle, the seat of your grandfather, the late Baron Linlithgow; and the only relics of his childhood that he possesses are two little articles, a sack and a sock, both of which are embroidered with the eglantine, which your lordship knows to be the symbol of the Seton-Linlithgows, just as the rose was the symbol of the Sinclairs of Roslyn."

"Yes," said the earl, with a smile, "and many of the daughters of Seton-Linlithgow were named after their flower, as many of the ladies of Roslyn were named after their rose. But go on, my dearest Susan."

"Nor was there so much in all this, had not the crest of the Barons of Seton-Linlithgow been embroidered among the leaves of this symbolic flower, the eglantine. That alone would have been worthless. Any lady of the house of Seton-Linlithgow might have given the cast-off garments of her infant to any servant or peasant woman needing clothing for her child; but taken in connection with the strong likeness between your lordship and the possessor of these relics, I think they mean much. What do you think, Lord Wellrose?" inquired Susy, looking intently into the face of the earl.

"Do you know what you have stated to be facts, my dear Susan? And have you seen these relics, as you call them?"

"Let me be accurate," said Suzy. "I know the likeness to be a fact; and so do you. I have seen the relics; and so may you. All the other facts I have from hearsay; but I believe them, and I believe they may be proved."

"Well, my dearest, whether this young man may have any claim upon me from kinship or from mere humanity, he has certain a claim stronger than either of these: it is that you, my beloved, are interested in his fate. When I leave you, Susan, I shall go as soon as possible to Mr. Percy Mellis, the most eminent lawyer for criminal cases in the world perhaps, and I shall retain him, and any other lawyer or half-dozen lawyers that he may recommend to assist him."

"Oh, I do thank you so much! And, Lord Wellrose, my purse, my whole fortune is freely at Benny's service, to secure the best counsel for him—yes, if it should take all I possess in the world to have Benny once more out of prison, and free from the horrible danger!" she exclaimed, with a shudder, bursting again into hysterical sobs and tears.

"Take comfort, dearest one," said the young earl, with much emotion. "As to the finding and retaining of the best counsel to be had, that shall be my care and my cost, my duty and my pleasure."

"No, no," said Suzy, eagerly, through her tears. "You may perhaps have the right to help Benny, and I am glad to know that you will do it; but I have certainly the right to help him, and I mean to do it, not only because he was a loved and trusted mem cause he was a loved and trusted member of my household—though that circumstance, considered in itself, is much—but more because he had always seemed to me like one of my own brothers, only dearer, far dearer than any brother I have, because he was just of my own age, and in our infancy shared my cradle and my food and play like my twin-brother. My lord, help him all you can, but let me bear the cost, for the precious old love's sake. You do not misunderstand me, I hope; do you, Lord Wellrose?" inquired Suzy in anxious tone.

"Misunderstand you, true heart, pure spirit? No, indeed. I understand you and confide in you, and love you perfectly. And I go from you now straight to the cell of the imprisoned boy, that I may confront him for your sake," said the earl, as he raised and pressed her hand to his lips.

CHAPTER XXIV

From Park Lane Lord Wellrose went straight to Lincoln's Inn Fields, and sought out the chambers of Mr. Percy Mellis, the great criminal lawyer.

So great was now the fame of this learned lawyer and eloquent advocate that he might have been a queen's counsel if he had but chosen to abandon the cause of the poor and needy—the men and women, ay, and little children, "more sinned against than sinning"—the cause of humanity, the cause of Christ, the cause of God.

So when he might have arisen to queen's counsel, queen's advocate, solicitor-general, attorney-general, or even, in time, lord chancellor, he chose to remain only the great criminal lawyer, with the questionable reputation and all but reproach that attaches to the name.

Their deep mutual interest in the "cause" had so frequently brought Lord Wellrose and himself into company, that a very warm friendship had grown up between the gifted advocate and the [illegible] earl!

When Lord Wellrose had been preparing his famous "bill for the regeneration of criminals, and the reform of prison discipline," he took frequent occasion to consult Mr. Percy Mellis, who gave him valuable aid in his humane enterprise.

And so their friendship had matured.

And now the young earl sought the great criminal lawyer in behalf of Benjamin Hurst, a prisoner in Newgate, charged with the murder of the Honorable Stuart Fitzroy, son of the Viscount St. Paul.

Arriving at the house, he sent up his card, on which he had written in pencil, under his name, "life and death."

He was at once admitted, and after going up two flights of stairs and passing through two or three rooms, each occupied by two or three clerks, he was shown into a back chamber, where the great advocate sat writing at a table covered with papers.

Mr. Mellis immediately arose to receive Lord Wellrose.

"Busy?" inquired the earl, with a smile.

"Nevertheless, you see, I interrupt you," said the earl apologetically, as he took the offered seat.

"Your lordship is most heartily welcome," answered the advocate, as he reseated himself at the table, and, turning his face toward his visitor, assumed an attentive expression.

"You have heard about this murder in Piccadilly, of course? The papers are full of it, and it is the talk of all London."

"The murder of Stuart Fitzroy. Yes, certainly. Who has not?"

"No one, probably. But I come to you this morning in behalf of the young man who is charged with the murder, and whom I believe from my soul to be as guiltless of that crime as you or myself," said the young earl earnestly.

"There is at least, no good evidence against him. But, for the murder of Lord St. Paul's son, I suppose the coroner and his jury thought they must commit somebody, right or wrong, and so they committed this poor young man. Do you know anything of him?" inquired Mr. Mellis.

"Know him?" echoed Lord Wellrose, with some emotion. "Yes, I know him well, and feel the deepest compassion for his misfortune. I come this morning to ask you to undertake his defense. Can you do it? Are you too busy?"

"Am I busy? I am always busy, very busy. And yet I have always time to do everything that I ought to do. I ought to defend this young man, and I will certainly find time to do it."

"Spoken like yourself, good friend! Thanks," said the earl, as he opened his pocketbook and took from it a Bank of England note for a hundred pounds, which he quietly laid upon the lawyer's table as a retaining fee. Then he arose to depart.

"I will get through a little pressing business this forenoon, and early this afternoon I will see my new client," said the lawyer, rising to attend his distinguished visitor to the door.

The Earl of Wellrose went next to Newgate.

He was well acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Ross, the chaplain of the prison, who was also the Duchess of Cheviot's almoner to the poor and friendless prisoners.

His lordship asked for the chaplain, and was shown into his [illegible] room.

Mr Ross was not the same chaplain who had been in office there when Benny, the child, had been incarcerated for burglary, and consequently he knew nothing whatever of the history of the new prisoner, Benjamin Hurst.

But when the Earl of Wellrose entered the chaplain's room, the latter thought his lordship had only come upon some benevolent errand to him as the Duchess of Cheviot's almoner.

The chaplain was quite a mild man, with a tall, spare form, clad in a threadbare suit of black, a fine bald head, adorned with a few thin locks of silver hair, and a pale, thin face, with a holy calm upon it, full of the love of God and man.

He arose to meet the young earl, and offered him his hand, and begged him to sit down, and inquired after the good duchess, his mother.

Lord Wellrose thanked him and sat down and replied satisfactorily to his questions, and then opened the subject of his visit by asking the chaplain if he had yet seen the new prisoner, Benjamin Hurst.

"Who is charged with the murder of young Stuart Fitzroy? No, I have not yet seen him. I was indeed about to visit his cell when your lordship's name was announced. Alas!" sighed the aged minister, using a very old-fashioned interjection. "Alas! I have heard this is another case of neglected childhood growing up to depraved youth and criminal manhood. The papers state that this wretched young man has been a thief and an outcast, and the companion of burglars and cut-throats from his infancy up. It is said that he has but recently returned from a fourteen years' transportation for burglary. And that he obtained the situation of butler at the house where he was engaged only by a false character and forged recommendation. All this will tell very much against him in the coming trial. But I must visit him, and save him, if through the Lord's help I may. Our Divine Master 'came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance,'" said the chaplain, reverently bowing his head.

The young earl looked gravely at the speaker for a moment and then said:

"'Who hath sinned, this man or his parents that he is born blind?' Even if all the crimes falsely imputed to Benjamin Hurst were committed by him, still let us ask, 'Who hath sinned, this man, or his parents,' or you or I, and all society, that he is born blind—morally and spiritually blind?"

"I know that we all have sinned."

"Yes," said the earl, "we have all sinned in this respect, more than in all others."

"Each one of us, the very poorest of us, might save at least one little destitute, neglected child from remaining the companion of thieves and outcasts, and from growing up to become a thief or a murderer," added the chaplain.

And there [illegible] silence between the two for a while, and then the young earl said:

"All that the scandalmongering daily papers have falsely said of Benjamin Hurst might well have been true; and yet still it might have been truly said of him that he was 'more sinned against than sinning.'"

"Yes, yes; that is what your gracious mother, the duchess, often says of the worst criminals confined in this prison."

"And she is nearly right. But in this case of Benjamin Hurst, she is entirely right. He is, indeed, Heaven knows, more, much more, very much more, 'sinned against than sinning.' In his ignorant infancy he became the charge of thieves and outcasts; he was taught evil for good, sin for duty. He learned the lessons and performed the tasks for love of those around him. He became, for their sakes, because he knew no better, a beggar, a liar, and a thief, just as another more fortunate child, from the same motives of conscience and affection, might have become a philanthropist, and an advocate of truth and a benefactor of his kind. One whom I love and trust, and who has known Benjamin Hurst from his babyhood and here, has told me so much of his sweetness of temper, goodness of heart, gentleness of manners and docility of disposition that I can see perfectly well how easy it was for the thieves and outcasts who were his only protectors, and who had won his childish heart, to turn all his inherent good qualities to evil uses. But these evil uses were habits, that were no more a part of the boy's nature than were his poor little ragged jacket and trousers a part of himself. And he was one who only needed to be shown the right to see its beauty, to love it, and prefer it to the wrong; just as he would have preferred clean and whole clothes to ragged and filthy ones. And almost the first glimpse he had of the right was caught within these prison walls, from your venerable predecessor, the then chaplain. I have heard how eagerly and gratefully he learned the good lessons taught him here. And I have only recently known Benjamin Hurst well, but all I have seen of him has shown me a young man true, pure, brave, just, and singularly refined in person, in manner, and in spirit; a young man rare in any rank of life and wonderfully rare in his."

"Your lordship is very earnest in his advocacy of this young prisoner. I trust your lordship may be right," said the chaplain.

"When you see and talk with Benjamin Hurst you will know that I am right. I think you said that you were about to visit him in his cell. If so, I should be obliged if you will take me with you. I wish to see him privately, or at least with no other witness than yourself. Can you gratify me?" inquired the young earl.

The chaplain whispered a few words to him. He went out, and after some moments a turnkey entered and respectfully intimated that he was "at the service of his reverence."

The turnkey led the way, and the earl and the chaplain followed through many passages, and up and down many flights of stairs, until they came to a row of cells, at one of which the man stopped and suddenly thrust in a key, opened the door, and admitted the visitors.

The [illegible] young prisoner, when suddenly exposed to view, was found sitting on the side of his rude bunk, engaged in reading a small volume.

On seeing his visitors, he quickly turned down the leaf of the volume he was reading, laid the book aside, and arose to meet that one visitor whom he recognized, with the heartfelt acknowledgment:

"I knew your lordship would come to see me in my trouble! I thank your lordship very much!"

"My poor fellow, I am very sorry to see you here," said the earl taking his hand and pressing it, and still continuing to hold it, while he added: "This gentleman who accompanies me is the Rev. Mr. Ross, the prison chaplain, and he wishes to be your friend." Then turning to Mr. Ross, he said: "Reverend sir, this is Benjamin Hurst, who, though a prisoner here, charged with a crime I feel sure that he did not and could not commit, [illegible] my entire confidence and esteem."

"Oh, thanks for these good and gracious words!" said the young prisoner, earnestly.

"I hope and trust in the Lord that I may be able to serve you, my young friend," said the chaplain, kindly shaking hands with the prisoner.

There were few accommodations for visitors in these rude prison cells. Therefore the three sat down on the side of the bunk, that did the double duty of bed by night and bench by day.

"What have you been reading?" inquired the chaplain, taking up the little book that Benny had laid aside. "Ah, I see," he said, as he opened it.

The book was the New Testament, and the leaf was folded down at the twenty-sixth chapter of St. Mathew's Gospel, describing the Saviour's agony in the garden of Gethsemane.

"Why did you select this particular part of the Scripture to read this morning?" enquired the chaplain.

Benny looked down at his own fettered limbs, and around upon the heavy stone walls and strong iron gratings of his prison cell, and then raised his mournful blue eyes to the face of the chaplain. And the good man was answered.

"I see," he said, with a sigh, as he laid down the book and arose and stood with his back to the grated door, facing the two young men, the unconscious brothers, who were still seated side by side on the edge of the bunk. And as he looked at them his aged face grew deep in interest.

How much alike these young men, though severed so far in rank and in position; only that one was so pale, thin, and wasted, and the other was in such ruddy health, that the one seemed but the faded-out image of the other.

"They are enough alike to be the children of the same parents," thought the minister. "And yet what a contrast!" And at the thought the good man sighed.

The young earl, with almost womanly tenderness, held and white, transparent hand of his unknown brother and wondered at the more than sympathy, at the warmth of affection, he felt for the poor, patient young prisoner.

And as for Benny, a strange feeling of protection and peace came over his spirit.

When the Liver Gets Torpid

Mrs. C. L. Cook, 249 Tenth street, Brandon, Man., writes: "I have used Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills for the last four years for liver trouble, and can say that I have had great satisfaction and help from them. I find that I do not need any doctor if I use them when the liver gets torpid, and believe that they are actually suited for my case. My husband has used them for kidney trouble, with good results, and my daughter in Winnipeg has been helped a great deal by the use of these pills. We say we can't keep house without them, and have cheated the doctors here out of a good many visits. I think Dr. Chase's medicines are just the thing, and have recommended them to many people, who have used them with good results."

By keeping the liver active and the bowels regular Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills prevent and cure such disorders as biliousness, constipation, chronic indigestion and headache. One pill a dose, 25c a box, 5 for $1.00; all dealers, or Edmanson, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto.

Great Snakes.

"When I was in Orange, Tex., one time," said a New Yorker who travels around a good deal, "somehow the talk at the hotel turned to rattlesnakes; how big they'd get and how big they wouldn't get; what they'd do and what they wouldn't do, the environment of Orange being in no way shy of material for object lessons on the subject. By and by Capt. Ed. Davis, the famous south Texas hunter and fisherman, was moved to say:

"'I don't believe in the theory that a rattlesnake grows a rattle for every year of his life. I killed a rattler once that wasn't much more than a couple of feet long, and he had fourteen rattles. The one that Judge Wingate shot up at Slade's camp only had six.'

"'Was the Judge's snake a pretty good size one, Captain?' said I, for I always want to be shown.

"'Oh, fair to middlin' size,' replied Capt. Ed. 'It had a yearlin' fawn in it.'

"Exact dimensions after that I didn't think it was necessary to call for."

A MOTHER'S PRAISE OF BABY'S OWN TABLETS

Mr. Fred Tinkham, South Canaan, N. S., writes:—"Please send me another box of Baby's Own Tablets as I do not care to be without them. I have used them repeatedly and consider them the best medicine in the world for little ones." Thousands of other mothers say the same thing. The tablets cure all the minor ills of childhood such as constipation, sour stomach, colic, colds, simple fevers, etc., and are guaranteed to be absolutely safe. Sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

MEN AND DRESS.

(Montreal Mail)

The business world is just beginning to realize that it has a fertile field for cultivation in the modern tendency of men to [illegible] dress. Time after time, in recent years, utilization of this asset has proved profit[illegible].

The women have always been victims of the [illegible] because of their alleged love and dress. We are beginning to realize that men are much the same as women. Let it become known that a certain form of masculine attire is "the style" and the men will rush for it.

Here is a very valuable asset for the business man. If he can get the men "going," he will keep [illegible]. He has their "coming" already and the development of this latest tendency in business will be interesting to watch. CANADA'S DISGRACE.

(Montreal Star)

In this country a man is punished for causing the spread of disease by carelessness, but a person may throw a smouldering cigarette into a waste paper basket and cause appalling loss, yet be free from all punishment. The average fire losses of Montreal, with a population of a little over half a million, are estimated at about a million a year, while in European cities of the size of Montreal the average annual loss is less than a quarter of this amount, [illegible] this Continent [illegible], one dollar and twenty-five cents per capita for the maintenance of our fire departments, compared with fifty cents per capita in Europe.

JAPANESE MONEY.

Yens, Sens and Rins Complete Their Simple Currency System.

The Japanese current system is very simple and is based upon a gold basis. The unit of value is a yen. This equals 50 cents in gold, according to our United States values. One yen is divided into 100 sen. Each of the latter is worth just one-half of an American cent. The Japanese sen is the equivalent of 10 rin, and the smallest Japanese coin consists of a five rin piece, the equivalent of one-quarter of an American penny.

The currency media is composed of paper notes, silver, nickel and copper. The Japs have their paper money in one, five, ten yen notes and upward. The silver money comes in ten, twenty and fifty sen pieces. The smallest nickel piece is valued at 5 sen. Then comes the sen, 1 sen and 5 rin.

This is substance of the entire currency system in Japan when you step into a money changer's to procure the coin of the realm. But you do not always obtain the equivalent in values for your American currency. The various seaport towns swarm with Chinese money changers. These Mongolian financiers deduct a rebate of from 1 to 2 per cent for every $10 in American money exchanged. When you travel in the interior localities of Japan, away from the beaten track of tourist traffic, you will be compelled to pay even a higher rate of exchange, as the Jap merchants refuse to accept foreign coin in exchange for their wares unless they are easily accessible to some nearby seaport town.

The Jap nickel, or five sen piece, will buy five or six times as much for a Jap in his own country as the same value of currency would buy for an American home in the United States. The simplicity of the native currency system goes hand in hand with the frugality and the wise economies of these quaint, active little people.—Philadelphia North American.

Mount Rainier's Shadows.

There are some wonderful shadow effects produced by and upon the gigantic snowy cone of Mount Rainier. It sometimes happens that the sky as seen from the city of Tacoma just before sunrise is covered with a dome of cloud 15,000 feet or more in height, while behind the peak, toward the east, the sky is clear. In such circumstances the rising sun casts the shadows of the great mountain upon the cloud curtain overhead in the form of a vast blue triangle, the point of which rests upon the apex of the peak. At other times the shadow of the earth can be seen creeping up the cone in a distinct curve, while the flush of sunset stains the snow above the line of shadow to a deep pink.

Of course, it would be easy to flare up and deny the right of Great Britain to say what shall be contraband or to interfere with any ships on the high seas flying neutral flags, whatever their cargoes. The United States in its wars has claimed and exercised the right to declare contraband and to search for it and it must concede to Great Britain the same right which it asserts for itself.

DISFIGURING RASH SPREAD OVER CHILD

Itching and Burning. Restless and Fretful at Night. Used Cuticura Soap and Ointment. In Two Months No Trace of Trouble.

Kincardine, Ont.—"My child's trouble began with a rash around the ears. This spread over the surface of the body turning to small sores which were itching and burning. The rash also appeared on my child's face and for the time disfigured him. The itching was so intense that it constantly caused him to irritate the eruption by continually scratching. He was restless and fretful at night.

"Without success I tried remedies. The first two applications of Cuticura Soap and Ointment stopped the burning and eased the itching. We first bathed him using the Soap and then applied the Ointment. In two months' time no trace of the trouble was seen." (Signed) G. Campbell, May 23, 1914.

TREATING.

(Grand Rapids Herald)

Treating, essentially an American custom, has done much to spread habits of intemperance. Prince Collier in his book on the Germans tells us that the term "Dutch-treat" has a vital meaning in the fatherland, where they go upon the sensible assumption that the man who wants a drink should do his own paying, and it is considered just as reasonable to present a casual acquaintance with a piece of pie or a pair of shoestrings as a glass of beer. The treating custom is based on false ideals of politeness. It makes a man drink more than he wants or should have. An antitreating society among us should do more good in a year than a ton of tracts.

BIFOCAL LENSES.

Everybody who uses bifocal glasses probably wonders where the idea originally came from. Bifocal glasses are the kind that possess two separate lenses cemented together so that by looking in the upper part one can see at a great distance and by looking through the lower half one can read.

Most authorities are inclined to give Benjamin Franklin credit for the invention. He was, so the story goes, an inveterate reader and could not use his reading glasses when looking any distance away.

Finally the notion came to him that he could combine his glasses, and he thereupon had the lenses cut in half and one half of each lens placed in the rim of each spectacle rim. The result was that a single pair of glasses was sufficient, though present day oculists state that the sharply drawn line must have affected the eyes.

From this idea the oculists gradually developed a glass in which the lower part was arranged for reading and the upper part for long distance vision, while the annoying "marking line" was eliminated.—Washington Star.

AFTER THE WAR.

(Pittsburg Gazette-Times)

Some English editors who are looking pretty far ahead are discussing a possible condition after the war to which few have given thought. It is the state of feeling that is likely to prevail between the men who have volunteered and those who have not, the attitude of the public and of employers towards the stay-at-homes. Millions of able-bodied men will likely return home and seek their old jobs. [illegible]

THE HATE FOR BRITAIN.

Great Britain may well make every provision for the prevention of the invasion of its shores, for should the Kaiser's troops ever get a foothold there, Belgium would be a paradise in comparison to the old country were the Germans permitted to wreak their vengeance on the British. From all sources come the tidings that of all its enemies, Britain is the most hated in Germany. The reason is not far to seek. The Kaiser and his people know that it was Britain that spoiled the German plans for an easy conquest of France and Russia. Baffled in their nefarious design, they have turned their whole rage and fury upon Britain. To such an extent have they done this that British prisoners are treated with the greatest severity, while French and other prisoners receive much better treatment. The Berlin correspondent of the Kolnische Volkszeitung discusses the sentiments of the Berliners towards the various nations with which Germany is at war.

At the beginning of the war the writers the whole blame was put on Russia. The fact that the Minister of War denied on his word of honor that mobilization was in progress caused profound indignation, and the Tsar was styled by the press the "lying Tsar." In time, however, it came to be recognized that the diplomatic campaign against Germany was being directed more from London than from Petrograd, and subsequent publications furnished proof that Sir Edward Grey had led the anti-German enterprise. It is further recognized that, although all our enemies naturally desire our defeat, the aim of the English is by far the most radical. Russia wishes to thrust back Germandom in Europe in favor of Slavism. The French desire to regain Alsace-Lorraine; but England wants to bring about our economic ruin and to make us bankrupt. In the interest of her pocketbook she wishes to destroy our commerce, our shipping and our navy. The belief that the statesmen on the Thames have not hesitated, from purely materialistic motives, to cause such an ocean of blood and misery to deluge Europe is somewhat depressing. One cannot conceive that civilized people could be capable of such tigerish cruelty. Yet it is the truth that England, who is so proud of her culture and right-mindedness, allows hundreds of thousands of human beings to slaughter one another in order that she may earn more after the war and conquer for herself an economic world monopoly. The struggle of the French and Russians against us at least reveals a trace of idealism. England, however, wants only to make money, and to fill her purse at our expense.

Of course, this is a perversion of the reasons why Britain is at war. But the German people take this view of the situation, and as the economic and other pressure is brought to bear upon them, their hatred of the British increases and intensifies.

THE FRENCH SIDE

The French Yellow Book, published by the New York Times, a most creditable journalistic feat and well worthy to be noted as a somewhat remarkable newspaper achievement, covers a large amount of matter, giving the whole correspondence between the French Ambassadors and others in connection with the present war. It is a most interesting document, and not only leaves no doubt as to who is responsible for the war, but the correspondence gives a glimpse or insight into German action and German motive prior to the outbreak of the war. It appears that Germany's indignation and jealousy was first directed towards France. Rightly or wrongly, the Germans believed that they had been outwitted by French diplomacy, and resented the airs they considered that France was putting on. M. Jules Cambon, the French Ambassador at Berlin, as long ago as March 17, 1913, scented danger. He wrote to the French Minister for Foreign Affairs:

Germany's new departure has produced a situation she did not expect—the proposal of the Government of the Republic re-establishing three years' service, and the virile resolution with which this proposal has been greeted in France. The impression of astonishment made by these proposals has been turned to account by the Imperial Government to urge the absolute necessity for an increase in the military forces of Germany. The plans for this increase are represented as being a reply. This is contrary to truth, since the immense military effort accepted by France is but the consequence of German initiative.

The Imperial authorities lose no opportunity of exalting patriotic feeling. Every day the Emperor takes pleasure in recalling memories of 1813. Yesterday evening there was a military tattoo in the streets of Berlin, and speeches were delivered in which the present situation was compared with that of a century ago. The enthusiasm of public opinion will have its echo in the discussion which will begin next month in the Reichstag, and I have reason to fear that the Chancellor himself may be moved to make some allusion to relations between France and Germany in his statements to the House. This exaltation of the nation's patriotism at a time when fresh sacrifices are demanded of it was to be expected; but it is an abuse of historical parallel to compare the present with 1813. If the movement which a century ago aroused the German people against the man of genius who aspired to universal domination could find any equivalent to-day, it ought to be sought for in France, since the French people have no other thought but to defend itself against domination by force.

It is none the less true that this state of opinion in the two countries makes the situation grave.

Writing two days previously to this Lieut.-Col. Serret, military attache at the French Embassy in Berlin, reported to M. Etienne, French Minister of War, his views on the situation, from which the following is taken:

For some time past people have been heard to declare that the military proposals of France were extraordinary and unjustified. In a drawing-room a member of the Reichstag, and not an agitator, speaking of the three years' service in France, went so far as to say: "It is a provocation, and we shall not permit it." More moderate people, both soldiers and civilians, currently support the thesis that France with her forty million souls has not the right to rival Germany in this way.

In short, they are furious, and their anger is not the result of the outcry of certain French papers, which serious people scarcely heed; it is vexation. People are enraged to see that in spite of the enormous effort undertaken last year, which has been maintained, and again increased this year, they will probably still be unable to outdistance France. Since we neither wish to be nor can be with Germany, it is her real object to put us completely out of the race. This cannot be too often repeated, and the forthcoming law, which French opinion regards rather too much as being a spontaneous outburst, is but the inevitable and expected consequence of the law of June, 1912.

These extracts from the correspondence of these two Frenchmen show clearly that Germany deeply and angrily resented France's military preparations for her own safety. It was all right for Germany to strengthen her army and navy. But it was sheer impudence for France to try to keep up with Germany. It was something that German public opinion could not tolerate, and no doubt the Austrian note gave the Kaiser the excuse for attempting to teach France a lesson. The Kaiser has now a different conception of France from what he had in 1913.

EDITORIAL NOTES

Will Mr. Hearst hang on to the three fifths' clause?

The Sultan's holy war is no more successful than the other kind.

The Buffalo Evening News has discontinued the Sunday edition. It was up-to-date and all that, and had a large circulation. But it didn't pay. Hence its death.

The Laurier Government imposed the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific transcontinental systems upon the taxpayers of Canada.—Toronto News.

Well, what of it? Is the News opposed to these roads?

In order to fight an overwhelmingly more powerful foe it is clear that we must fight ruthlessly—ruthlessly in every sense of the word—without any regard whatever for any conceivable thing that lies outside the sphere of the sheer final ends of war.—Count Reventlow, the German naval strategist.

Why talk about the Marquis of Queensberry rules? The Germans kill and slay old men, women and children ruthlessly and gleefully, and the Kaiser looks on and claps his hands. It's not kultur, it's vulture.

The Ottawa Citizen asks the London Free Press to play fair with Laurier. Its continual reference to the Canadian naval ships as "tin-pots," leads the Citizen to say: "But surely it is carrying political partisanship to a most unpatriotic extreme to term such cruisers 'tinpots,' just because the Laurier Government advocated a policy of building up a Canadian fleet by starting with four similar town class cruisers and six also highly efficient river class torpedo-boat destroyers. It would be just about as intelligent and as accurate to term the Dreadnoughts white elephants." Now will the Free Press be good?

Bonar Law, the leader of the Tory Opposition in the British House of Commons, states that a day or two before the war was declared the following letter was sent to Premier Asquith:

"Dear Mr. Asquith, Lord Lansdowne and I feel it our duty to inform you that in our opinion, as well as in that of all the colleagues whom we have been able to consult, it would be fatal to the honor and security of the United Kingdom to hesitate in supporting France and Russia at the present juncture; and we offer our unhesitating support to the Government in any measure they may consider necessary for that object. Yours very truly, "A. Bonar Law."

In this way Britain was able to present a united front to Germany.

The Montreal Builders Exchange has made sweeping reductions in the rates of wages paid the building tradesmen, as part of a scheme to induce the public to build by lowering the cost of construction. It is stated that the Montreal supply dealers have met the unusual conditions by an average reduction in price equal to the wage decrease, and that the contractors will content themselves with a bare living profit, so that the low prices will tempt those needing buildings to have them constructed now. It was also decided that the brick and masonry contractors' section of the exchange should be conducted henceforth on the open shop principle. The prices agreed upon to be in force from January 1st to July 1st, 1915, as the maximum wages in the various trades were as follows:

Bricklayers	40c	55c
Plasterers	40c	50c
Tile setters	40c	[illegible]
Painters	[illegible]	[illegible]
Carpenters	30c	35c
Concrete framers	30c	45c
Building laborers	20c	25c

Although the prices in other trades were not fixed, there will be a corresponding reduction averaging twenty per cent. below the summer scale. As the bricklayers refused to agree to the scale, the Exchange declared itself an open shop.

A Public Idol

"I don't know that," said young Sartoris. "We liberals are by no means the cocks of the walk that we were a few years ago. You see now we have got nothing to pull against, as it were. So long as we had two or three good grievances, we could keep the party together and attract all the young men. We were Israel going up against the Phillistines, who had us in their grip. But now, things are changed; we've got our own way all round, and it's the Church party who have the grievances and the cry. It is we who are the Phillistines and the oppressors in our turn, and, of course, the young men as they grow up are going into opposition."

"And a very good thing, too," said Forbes. "It's the only thing that prevents Oxford becoming as dull as the rest of the world. All your picturesqueness, so to speak, has been struck out of the struggle between the two forces. The Church force is the one that has given you all your buildings and your beauty, while, as for you liberals, who will know such a lot of things that you're none the happier for knowing—well, I suppose you keep the place habitable for the plain man who doesn't want to be bullied. But it's a very good thing the other side are strong enough to keep you in order."

The conversation flowed on vigorously. Forbes guiding it, now here, now there, while Kendal presently turned away to talk in an undertone to Mrs. Stuart, who sat next to him, at the farther corner of the table from Miss Bretherton.

"Edward has told you of my escapade," said Mrs. Stuart. "Yes, I have put my foot in it dreadfully. I don't know how it will turn out, I am sure. She's so set upon it, and Edward is so worried. I don't know how I came to tell her. You see, I've seen so much of her lately, it slipped out when we were talking."

"It was very natural," said Kendal, glad to notice from Mrs. Stuart's way of attacking the subject that she knew nothing of his own share in the matter. It would have embarrassed him to be conscious of another observer. "Oh, a hundred things may turn up; there are ways out of these things if one is determined to find them."

Mrs. Stuart shook her head. "She is so curiously bent upon it. She is so possessed with the idea that the play will suit her better than any she has had yet. Don't you think her looking very tired? I have come to know her much better these last few weeks, and it seems absurd, but I get anxious about her. Of course, she is an enormous success, but I fancy the theatrical part of it has not been quite so great as it was at first."

"So I hear, too," said Kendal. "The theatre is quite as full, but the temper of the audience a good deal flatter."

"Yes," said Mrs. Stuart, "and then there is that curious little sister of hers, whom you haven't seen, and who counts for a good deal. I believe that in reality she is very fond of Isabel, and very proud of her, but she's very jealous of her, too, and she takes her revenge upon her sister for her beauty and her celebrity by collecting the hostile things people say about her acting, and pricking them into her every now and then, like so many pins. At first Isabel was so sure of herself and the public that she took no notice—it seemed to her only what every actress must expect. But now it is different. She is not so strong as she was when she came over, nor so happy, I think, and the criticisms tell more. She is heartily sick of the 'White Lady,' and is bent upon a change, and I believe she thinks this play of Edward's is just what she wants to enable her to strengthen her hold upon the public."

"There never was a greater delusion," said Kendal; "it's the last part in the world she ought to attempt. Properly speaking, unless she puts it in, there's no posing in it, none of that graceful attitudinizing she does so well. It's a long tragic part—a tremendous strain, and would take all the powers of the most accomplished art to give it variety and charm."

"Oh, I know," sighed Mrs. Stuart, "I know. But what is to be done?"

Kendal shrugged his shoulders with a smile, feeling as hopeless as she did. The paleness of the beautiful face opposite indeed had touched his sympathies very keenly, and he was beginning to think the safety of Wallace's play not such a desperately important matter after all. However, there was his promise, and he must go on with it. "But I'll be hanged," he said to himself, "if I come within a thousand miles of hurting her feelings. Wallace must do that for himself if he wants to."

It had been arranged that Miss Bretherton should be allowed two breaches, and two only, of the law against sight-seeing—a walk through the schools' quadrangle, and a drive down High street. Mr. Sartoris, who had been an examiner during the summer term, and had so crept into the good graces of the clerk of the schools, was sent off to suborn that functionary for the keys of the iron gates which on Sunday shut out the Oxford world from the sleepy precincts of the Bodleian. The old clerk was in a lax vacation mood, and the envoy returned key in hand. Mrs. Stuart and Forbes undertook the guidance of Miss Bretherton, while the others started to require the boats. It was a fine June day, and the grey buildings, with their cool shadows, stood out delicately against a pale blue sky dappled with white cloud. Her two guides led Miss Bretherton through the quadrangle of the schools, which, fresh as it was from the hands of the restorer, rose into the air like some dainty white piece of old-world confectionery. For the windows are set so lightly in the stonework, and are so nearly the level with the wall, that the whole great building has an unsubstantial cardboard air, as if a touch might dent it.

"Their doctrinaires call it a fault," said Forbes, indignantly, pointing out the feature to his companion. "I'd like to see them build anything nowadays with half so much imagination and charm."

They looked curiously at the closed door of the Bodleian, they read the Latin names of the schools just freshly painted at intervals round the quadrangle, and then Forbes led them out upon the steps in front of the Radcliffe and St. Mary's, and let them take their time a little.

"How strange that there should be nothing in the world," cried Miss Bretherton, "so beautiful all through, as all of a piece as this! I had no idea it would be half so good. Don't, don't laugh at me, Mr. Forbes. I have not seen all the beautiful things you other people have seen. Just let me rave."

"I laugh at you!" said Forbes, standing back in the shadow of the archway, his fine-lined face aglow with pleasure, turned toward her. "I who have got Oxford in my bones and marrow, so to speak! Why, every stone in that place is sacred to me! Poetry lives here, if she has fled from all the world beside. No, no; say what you like, it cannot be too strong for me."

Mrs. Stuart, meanwhile, kept her head cool, admired all that she was expected to admire, and did it well, and never forgot that the carriage was waiting for them, and that Miss Bretherton was not to be tired. It was she who took charge of the other two, piloted them safely into the fly, carried them down the High street, sternly refused to make a stop at Magdalen, and finally landed them in triumph to the minute at the great gate of Christchurch. Even they strolled into the quiet cathedral, delighted themselves with its irregular bizarre beauty, its unexpected turns and corners, which gave it a capricious fanciful air for all the solidity and business-like strength of its Norman framework, and as they rambled out again, Forbes made them pause over a window in the northern aisle, a window by some Flemish artist of the fifteenth century, who seems to have embodied in it at once all his knowledge and all his dreams. In front sat Jonah under his golden-stalked gourd, an ill-tempered Flemish peasant, while behind him the indented roofs of the Flemish town climbed the whole height of the background. It was probably the artist's native town; some roof among those carefully-outlined gables sheltered his own household Lares. But the hill on which the town stood, and the mountainous background and the purple sea, were the hills and the sea not of Belgium, but of a dream country, of Italy perhaps, the mediæval artist's paradise.

"Happy man!" said Forbes, turning to Miss Bretherton; "look, he put it together four centuries ago, all he knew and all he dreamed of. And there it is to this day, and beyond the spirit of that window there is no getting. For all our work, if we do it honestly, is a compound of what we know and what we dream."

Miss Bretherton looked at him curiously. It was as though for the first time she connected the man himself with his reputation and his pictures, that the great artist in him was more than a name to her. She listened to him sympathetically, and looked at the window closely, as though trying to follow all he had been saying. But it struck Mrs. Stuart that there was often a bewilderment in her manner which had been strange to it on her first entrance into London. Those strong, emphatic ways Kendal had first noticed in her were less frequent. Sometimes one struck Mrs. Stuart as having the air of a half-blindfold person trying to find her way along strange roads.

They passed out into the cool and darkness of the cloisters, and through the new buildings, and soon they were in the broad walk, trees as old as the Commonwealth being overhead, and in front the dazzling green of the June meadows, the shining river in the distance, and the sweep of cloud-flecked blue arching in the whole.

The gentlemen were waiting for them, metamorphosed in boating clothes, and the two boats were ready. A knot of idlers and lookers-on watched the embarkation, for on Sunday the river is forsaken, and they were the only adventurers on its blue expanse. Off they pushed, Miss Bretherton, Kendal, Mr. Stuart and Forbes in one boat, the remaining members of the party in the other. Isabel Bretherton had thrown off the wrap which she always carried with her, and which she had gathered round her in the cathedral, and it lay about her in green fur-edged folds, bringing her white dress into relief, the closely fall of the shoulders and all the round slimness of her form. As Kendal took the stroke oar, after he had arranged everything for her comfort, he asked her if Oxford was what she'd expected.

"A thousand times better!" she said eagerly.

"You have a wonderful power of enjoyment. One would think your London life would have spoiled it a little."

"I don't think anything ever could. I was always laughed at for it as a child. I enjoy everything."

"Including such a day as you had yesterday? How can you play the 'White Lady' twice in one day? It's enough to wear you out."

"Oh, everybody does it. I was bound to give a matinee to the profession, some time, and yesterday had been fixed for it for ages. But I have only given three matinees altogether, and I shan't give another before my time is up."

"That's a good hearing," said Kendal. "Do you get tired of the 'White Lady'?"

[illegible] emphatically. [illegible] she added, [illegible] with her hands clasped [illegible] so that what she said [illegible] be heard by Kendal only, "have [illegible] I wonder, what I have in [illegible] for the autumn? Oh, well, we [illegible] of it now. I have no [illegible] to make it public yet. But I would like to tell you [illegible]"

"[illegible] will make one," said Kendal, with an [illegible] smile. And she fell back again with a nod and a smile.

It was past five before they steered into the shadow of the Nuneham woods. The meadows just ahead were a golden blaze of light, but here the shade lay deep and green on the still water, spanned by a rustic bridge, and broken every now and then by the stately whiteness of the swans. Rich steep-lying woods shut in the left-hand bank, and foliage, grass, and wild flowers seemed suddenly to have sprung into a fuller luxuriance than elsewhere.

"It's too early for tea," said Mrs. Stuart's clear little voice on the bank; "at least, if we have it directly it will leave such a long time before the train starts. Wouldn't a stroll be pleasant first?"

Isabel Bretherton and Kendal only waited for the general assent before they wandered off ahead of the others. "I should like very much to have a [illegible] with you," she had said to him, as he handed her out of the boat. And now, here they were, and, as Kendal felt, the critical moment was come.

"I only want to tell you," she said, as they paused in the heart of the woods, a little out of breath after a bit of steep ascent, "that I had got hold of a play for next October that I think you are rather specially interested in—at least, Mr. Wallace told me you had heard of it, and gave him advice about it while he was writing it. I want so much to hear your ideas about it. It always seems to me that you have thought more about the stage and seen more acting than any one else I know, and I care for your opinion very much indeed—do tell me, if you will, what you thought of 'Elvira'?"

"Well," said Kendal quietly, as he made her give up her wrap to him to carry, "there is a great deal that's fine in it. The original sketch, as the first author left it, was good, and Wallace has enormously improved upon it. Galvez—"

"Isn't it most dramatic?" she exclaimed, interrupting him; "there are so many strong situations in it, and though people might think the subject a little modern out if one only heard it described, yet there is nothing in the treatment but what is noble and tender. I have very seldom felt so stirred by anything. I find myself dreaming [illegible] thinking over them the way [illegible] that [illegible]"

"It is very good and friendly of you," said Kendal, warmly, "to wish me to give you advice about it. Do you really want me to speak my mind?"

"Of course I do," she said, earnestly, "of course I do. I think there are one or two points in it that might be changed. I shall press Mr. Wallace to make a few alterations. I wonder what were the changes that occurred to you?"

"I wasn't thinking of changes," said Kendal, not venturing to look at her as she walked beside him, her white dress trailing over the moss-grown path, and her large hat falling back from the brilliant flushed cheeks and emerald throat. "I was thinking of the play itself, whether the part would really suit you."

"Oh, I have no doubts at all about that," she said, but with a quick look at him; "I always feel at once when a part will suit me, and I have fallen in love with this one. It is tragic and passionate, like the 'White Lady,' but it is quite a different phase and passion. I am tired of scolding and disclaiming. 'Elvira' will give me an opportunity of showing what I can do with something soft and pathetic. I have had such difficulties in deciding upon a play to begin my October season with, and now this seems to me exactly what I want. People prefer me always in something poetical and romantic, and this is new, and the meaning of it might be quite original."

"And yet I doubt," said Kendal, "I think the part of Elvira wants variety, and would it not be well for you to have more of a chance? Something with more relief in it, something which would give your lighter vein, which comes in so well in the 'White Lady,' more chance?"

She frowned a little, and shook her head. "My turn is not that way. I can play a comedy part, of course—every actor ought to be able to—but I don't feel at home in it, and it never gives me pleasure to act."

"I don't mean a mere light-comedy part naturally, but something which would be less of a continuous tragic strain than this. Why, almost all the modern tragic plays have their passages of relief, but the texture of 'Elvira' is so much the same throughout that I cannot conceive a greater demand on any one. And then you must consider your company. Frankly, I cannot imagine a part less suited to Mr. Hayes than Morlos; and his difficulties would react on you."

"I can chose whom I like," she said abruptly; "I am not bound to Mr. Hayes."

"Lastly," he said, cautiously, changing his ground a little, "I should have said—only, of course, you must know much better—that it is a little risky to give the British public such very serious fare as this, and immediately after the 'White Lady.' The English theatre-goer never seems to me to take kindly to medievalism—kings and knights and nobles—and the fifteenth century are very likely to bore him. Not that I mean to imply for a moment that the play would be a failure in point of popularity. You have got such a hold that you could carry anything through; but I am inclined to think that in 'Elvira' you would be rather fighting against wind and tide, and that, as I said before, it would be a great strain upon you."

"The public makes no objection to Madame Desforets in Victor Hugo," she answered quickly, even sharply. "Her parts, so far as I know anything about them, are just these romantic parts, and she has made her enormous reputation out of them."

Kendal hesitated. "The French have a great tradition of them," he said. "Racine, after all, was a preparation for Victor Hugo."

"No, no!" she exclaimed, with sudden bitterness and a change of voice which startled him; "it is not that. It is that I am I, and Madame Desforets is Madame Desforets. Oh, I see! I see very well that your mind is against it. And Mr. Wallace—there were two or three things in his manner which have puzzled me. He has never said yes to my proposal formally. I understand perfectly what it means; you think that I shall do the play an injury by acting it; that it is too good for me!"

Kendal felt as if a thunderbolt had fallen, the sombre passion of her manner affected him indescribably.

"Miss Bretherton!" he cried.

Commentary.—I. Gideon's army (vs. 1-7). 1. Well of Harod—A fountain on the northern side of Mount Gilboa. From it flows a steam of considerable size. Hill of Moreh—It is thought Little Hermon is the hill meant, which is across the valley from Mount Gilboa. The thirty-two thousand Israelites were encamped on the north side of Mount Gilboa and the one hundred and thirty-five thousand Midianites were encamped to the north toward the hill of Moreh. 2. Vaunt themselves against me. The Lord saw the pride of heart of Israel and knew their disposition to neglect or forsake him. Mine own hand—Even if there were only the small army of Israel arrayed against more than four times as many Midianites, and the former should be victorious, they would not recognize God's hand in the victory. 3. Fearful and afraid—In Deut. 20: 1-8 several directions are given with regard to going out to war, and in one it is provided that the "fearful and fainthearted" shall return home.

4. Yet too many—The Lord purposed to show the people that the victory to be achieved would not come through human might. Unto the water—The fountain of Harod and the stream flowing from it. This shall go. ... this shall not go—Another test was ordered which would further reduce the number in the army. 5. Lappeth of the water—From the following verse it is learned that this expression means to drink by bringing water with the hand to the mouth, as a dog conveys water into its mouth with its tongue. Boweth down—To kneel or lie down to bring the mouth to the water, and thus to drink. 6. Three hundred—A small number drank by lapping the water. 7. By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you—It is maintained that the men who drank by lapping water with their hands were more fully on their guard than those who bowed down to drink. They were standing and could keep their eyes on the enemy, and thus avoid being taken unawares. This test, however, may have been employed because the Lord knew that the greater number would drink in the convenient way of bowing down, and a very few would drink by lapping, and thus the number would be reduced to exactly the desired proportions. Every man unto his place—The three hundred had stood the two tests and were proved to be both brave and watchful. The others were sent to their tents, but the three hundred were retained as Gideon's army in marked contrast to the host of Midian in the valley.

II. Gideon encouraged (vs. 9-15). To give Gideon further encouragement the Lord arranged it so that he would hear a dream told by one of the men in the Midianite army, and its interpretation. The man dreamed that a cake of barley bread fell or rolled into the camp of the Midianites. It struck a tent and knocked it down, so that it fell flat on the ground. The man to be told the dream said, "This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon the son of Joash, a man of Israel: for into his hand hath God delivered Midian, and all the host." This interpretation showed that the Lord had inspired fear into the hearts of the Midianites.

III. The attack (vs. 16-20). 16. Into three companies—This was probably done that an approach to the camp of Midian might be made at several points at the same time. A trumpet in every man's hand—Trumpets and torches were usually carried by the leaders of the army and not by common soldiers; in this case each soldier was supplied with them. Empty pitchers—Earthenware vessels such as were used for carrying water. They were to conceal the lighted torches. Lamps—Torches—. 17. look on me—Gideon was the leader and his men were to carry out his plan fully and carefully. 18. on every side of all the camp—The contemplated attack would bring terror, as it would appear that the Midianites were wholly surrounded. The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon—"For Jehovah and for Gideon"—R. V. 19. beginning of the middle watch—It was about midnight. The night was divided into three watches, the evening, the middle and the morning. 20. Brake the pitchers—The sound of the breaking of three hundred pitchers at once would seem like a great clash of arms. The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon—This cry from three hundred men of war, accompanied by the sounding of three hundred trumpets, the breaking of as many pitchers and the glare of as many torches at midnight were sufficient to strike terror to the hearts of the enemy.

IV. The victory (vs. 21-25). 21. Every man in his place round about camp—To each of Gideon's three hundred men a work was assigned, and each did it. They were to sound their trumpets, hold up their lights and shout. As they did their part, the Lord did His, and victory was certain. The host ran, and cried and fled. The Midianites were terror-stricken and in utter confusion. 22. Every man's sword against his fellow—This was the Lord's doing. The Midianites mistook their fellows for enemies and turned their weapons upon one another. They fled with the hope of making their escape. There seems to have been no thought of making a stand to fight Israel. Beth-shittah ... Abel-meholah—The location of these places is uncertain. It is quite evident they were quite east of Jezreel, toward the Jordan. 23. Men of Israel pursued—Men from the various tribes were hastily summoned and joined in the destruction of their enemies. 24, 25. The men of Ephraim were called upon to take the region along the Jordan and head off the Midianites from making their escape. We did not hear of the Midianites again in history.

QUESTIONS.—Describe Gideon's call. How did the number in Gideon's army compare with that of the Midianites? What was the first test applied to Gideon's army? Describe the second test. Why did the Lord desire to reduce the number of men? What encouragement came to Gideon? Describe the equipment of Gideon's men. How was the attack made upon the camp of the Midianites? Describe the result.

Practical Survey.

Topic.—Divinely ordained tests.

I. Enjoined upon the army of Israel.

II. Effective against the Midianites.

I. Enjoined upon the army of Israel. God called Gideon to success. The reduction of external means was God's way of giving success. Everything was in apparent readiness when two mysterious tests were enjoined, first, to check the unbelief and self-conceit of men and to secure efficiency, by a trial of courage and discipline of faith and inspiration. The army was reduced to its effective strength, not extensive, but intensive. The second test revealed the presence or absence of the rarer qualities. Gideon's faith was sorely tried on the eve of battle, but we have no complaint from him. Before God's clear command all his natural feelings and wishes gave way at once. His faith prompted him to obey at whatever sacrifice of inclination or desire. Alone of all that host he had borne the responsibility of reducing it to three hundred. He looked with a single eye to the will of God and took no count of consequences to himself or to others. He set the word and promise of God on one side and all the fearful risks and dangers on the other, when he had taken due care and caution in verifying the work of God. Abundant assurance was given to him that the for what he did. Divine wisdom was afterward seen in the selection of the three hundred. It was that God's power might be recognized in the victory. The soldiers did not know that they were determining their fate when they drank, but that little incident revealed their characters.

II. Effective against the Midianites. Belief in the victory of Jehovah was all important with Gideon since he had received direct and distinct assurance that in the coming battle he should be triumphant; yet he needed the conviction that in the impending conflict numbers would count for nothing. In a singular and grotesque style the dream of the barley cake with its interpretation taught him exactly that fact. In it we see an exquisite adaptation of divine revelation to human requirements. The heathen arrayed against him unwittingly proved to be his timely stimulus. It was necessary for Gideon to be well aware of the facts, to know fully the nature of the opposition. Hearing from his enemies the promise of victory, Gideon hastened back to his camp filled with reverence and joy to prepare for an immediate attack. His scheme was simple, quaint and ingenious. His profound trust in God gave character to his plans. His strategy is one of the military marvels of antiquity. A great end was reached by most insignificant instrumentality. Never did means appear more contemptible than those employed by Gideon. The result proved their efficiency, yet what served at that juncture would have been utterly useless at another time. Gideon's victory was a triumph of thought and of contrivance, a victory God-given and complete. The Israelites stood every man in his place while fear and suspicion did the work. The dismay he created and the confusion thus created in the hostile camp secured him victory. Darkness and ignorance made the Midianites their own worst enemy. There was a strange power in Israel's battle-cry, but there was no blasphemy in it. By it Gideon's army made humble recognition of the fact that God had taken Gideon into his service and into joint possession of the sword with which Gideon fought. Israel realized that the battle they had to fight was the Lord's and not their own. They stood in unity, courage and faith, the finite in co-operation with the Infinite. The far-reaching encampment of the Midianites was, to all appearances, organized for defence at every point, while Israel was, in their estimation, a defeated, famished people whose life had been almost crushed. That one fact which had become known to the Midianites, of Israel's return to Jehovah, shaped into the dream of one man and the interpretation of it expressed the cause of trembling which spread through the heathen host. For days and nights the retreat of the Midianites went on until the strange, swift triumph of Israel was assured. T. R. A.

The Cause of Dyspepsia.

The Symptoms and The Cure.

THE CAUSE.

Too rapid eating, eating too much, and too often, improperly chewing the food, eating too much stimulating food, and indulging in improper diet generally.

THE SYMPTOMS.

Variable appetite, rising and souring of food, heartburn, wind in the stomach, a feeling of weight in the stomach, in fact a feeling that your stomach has gone all wrong and that the food you eat does not seem to agree with you.

THE CURE.

BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS.

Mrs. E. Wilkinson, Wheeler, Ont., writes: "I have been a sufferer for years from dyspepsia, and could scarcely eat anything. I tried Burdock Blood Bitters, and I am entirely cured. I have not been troubled since I took it, and that is two years ago. I can now eat anything I wish."

Don't Allow Your Bowels To Become Constipated.

If the truth was only known you would find that over one half of the ills of life are caused by allowing the bowels to get into a constipated condition.

When the bowels become constipated the stomach gets out of order, the liver does not work properly, and then follows the sick or sick headaches, the sourness of the stomach, belching of wind, heartburn, water brash, biliousness, and a general feeling that you do not care to do anything.

Keep the bowels regular by using Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. They will clear away all the effete matter which collects in the system and make you think that life is worth living."

Mrs. [illegible] McKittrick, Wakefield, Que., writes: "[illegible] I was troubled with [illegible] until I used Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. I had only taken [illegible] I will recommend [illegible]"

"Well, Father Can Play"

Yes, better than he ever thought possible! All the years that he has spent unable to play have been storing up a great fund of memories, and now that the

with the wonderful Meister-Touch Action has set his musical heart free from his untrained fingers, he finds himself able to give wonderful expression to whatever he plays.

He can play "Rule Britannia" or the "Marseillaise" with so much vigor and go that one's feet start marching whether or no, and to every other kind of music he brings the same genuine understanding of latent talent.

This superb instrument is the very finest example of player-piano making. Its tone—its control of time and melody—its appearance—all are unexcelled.

APPROVE OF ROWELL'S POLICY.

Conservative temperance men are beginning to express frankly their approval of Mr. Rowell's proposal to co-operate with the Government in closing all social drinking places during the progress of the war and at the conclusion of the war to submit to the people on a majority vote the question of whether these places are to be re-opened or not.

Mr. A. R. Williams, for example head of the A. R. Williams Machinery Company, and a well-known Toronto Conservative, says, "Mr. Rowell's proposal is simply splendid. It shows once more that he is perfectly willing to share with the Government the great honor of making a substantial temperance advance. It shows that he is not moved by political motives but by a genuine desire for temperance reform."

"I agree with him thoroughly that some definite and decisive move should be made to curtail the liquor traffic during the progress of the war. I cannot see how the Government can refuse Mr. Rowell's offer to co-operate with them in doing something which would bring so much good to the Province of Ontario."

"Ex-Alderman James Hales, another Conservative says, "I very cordially approve of Mr. Rowell's proposal. Indeed I should like to see our legislators go a good deal further and entirely prohibit the traffic which makes men unfit and does them no good whatever. The people of Ontario have a right to expect their legislators to be as alert and progressive as the legislators of Russia."

A MAN'S WORD

A defeated municipal candidate knows the value of promises. He knows how much stock to take in them. The fact of the matter is no promises should be made. A canvas for a municipal position should not be considered. The ratepayers know the men, and if left severely alone will elect the very best. But they are not left alone. The candidates do not want to go down to defeat, and so they solicit votes.

They appeal to everyone, and rather then give an offensive answer some of the electors promise to support the man who solicits their vote and they do not deliver the goods. When the returns are announced the defeated candidate can almost say with the Psalmist that "all men are liars" This moral condition is not confined to any particular town or locality, and it is not confined to this one thing alone. A man's word should be as good as his bond, when he agrees to do a thing, he should remember that his honor is pledged, but honor is cast to the four winds and the whole foundation of the morals of the community is shaken. This is a condition existing to-day and the leaders of moral and social reform, should try and effect a reform.

World Rivival of Religion

A writer in the London Advertiser says:—

I read today with much interest Mr. De Forest's letter of the need of a world revival of religion and I beg permission to write a few words in reply. No Christian doubts for a moment the excellency of Mr. De Forest's motive when he advocates the necessity of a revival of prayer to put an end to this crushing militarism that is blighting the peace of the world and in fact nearly all he has written is splendid, as far as ideals for the betterment of humanity are concerned, but I wish to point out that there is not a single reference to "Thus saith the Lord," in his letter. No one desires universal peace more than I do, but I am not optimistic enough to believe that such a condition can be enjoyed by the nations of the world before God's time. When the present evil age has run its course, the world will enjoy peace but not before. We cannot have universal peace without the presence of the Prince of Peace, and he has not returned yet, but I believe he is coming soon. The Prince of the Power of the air, commonly known as Satan, is ruling at present and the world is obeying his dictates. The Apostle Paul refers to him as "the god of the world" (II Corinthians iv 4) and the fact of the so-called Christian nations being engaged in wholesale butchery is clear and emphatic proof that the Apostle speaks the truth. We read in Isiah, lxi, 11, that "the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all nations," but we also read in the same chapter, verse 2, that the day of "vengeance" and "mourning" is coming. When Christ stood up to preach in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke iv 16) he made reference to the same passage in Isaah, but after enunciating the fact that he was anointed "to preach the acceptable year of the Lord verse 19, he closed the book. He did not make reference to the "day of vengeance of our God," because it is yet future. We are at present living in the acceptable year of the Lord', but the Word teaches that the wrath of God is going to be let loose on the world is fast preparing for that judgment. I heartily agree with Mr. De Forest in exhorting all Christian workers to join earnestly in prayer, not however for the crushing of militarism, nor for universal peace, but for the coming of Jesus Christ, Our Lord who alone is real and only antidote for all the evils of the world. This universal peace notion that has taken hold of so many people since the commencement of the war is nothing more than a huge farce for the thing is not practicable, and is diametrically opposed to the teaching of Scripture with regard to this present economy. It is one of the devil's lies that people have swallowed whole sale, while they in many cases wilfully ignore the solemn statement of our Lord with regard to the time of the end. "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the days of the son of Man (Luke xvii. 26.) If the world is getting better or destined to be Christianized in this present evil age, then our Lord's words are utterly untrue and unreliable! So also many other utterances made by the apostles with regard to the increase of wickedness and ungodliness, which is to characterize the end of this age. The world is to be evangelized, but not Christianized. The gospel is to be preached among all nations for a witness, but not as a means of converting the nations in this age. God's revealed purpose in this age is to take out of the world a people for his name' who will in the next age rule and reign with Christ, but the world itself, including its religion, militarism, politics, etc. will remain as it always has been antagonostic to God, until after "the great tribulations" (Matthew xxiv) then and not before, will universal peace be inagurated, because the Prince of Peace "will reign over all the earth" (Zechariah xiv. 9)

St. John informs us that "the whole world lieth in the wicked" (I John v 19) and we all know that experimentally, there is no need for discussion on that point. If any person is inclined to doubt, St. John's statement let him consult the daily newspaper, and if he is not prejudiced or biased by reason of wrong teaching, the scales will fall from his eyes, and he will see clearly that the world is going to-day in exactly the manner the Bible predicts it will go, our Lord is at present in heaven, at the right hand of God" (I Peter iii 22) "upon the throne with the Father" (Psalms cx. 1 Revelations, iii, 21), "in the Holy of Holies" (Hebrews ix, 24) making the intercession for those that come unto God by him, but he is coming again Acts I, 11) and Christians are enjoined to pray for his coming, and to "love his appearing," for only when he comes will the swords and the spears of nations be beaten into plow shares and pruning hooks. It is lamentable the ignorance and prejudice that exist in these days amongst the clergy of our land with regard to this great and important truth. I am heartily ashamed of a great many of them, and I speak not from outside of the church, but from the inside. The Apostle Paul warns us in II Timothy, iv, 3 that "the time will come when people will not endure sound doctrine that time is now! People have little patience with a preacher who gives them the naked truth nowadays: they want to hear from the lips of a popular man that the world is getting better, and that they can go on in their usual sinful way of living, with the assurance of getting to heaven at last. I consider this condition of affairs to the negligence and timidity of many ministers, who are downright afraid to proclaim the truth in case it might cause trouble. Of course it will cause trouble, that is inevitable. The truth of God's Word never was popular at any time in this evil age, and never will be before Christ comes, but all honor to the brave minority who are faithfully holding up the torch in the ever-increasing gloom, despite the cold shoulder, the look of scorn, and the voice of ridicule from the nominal masses. The reckoning day is coming and at the judgment seat of Christ many rewards will be given and lost. I hope this letter will help some to understand the truth as it is contained in the Word of God, although not according to popular opinion. I have every sympathy with Mr. De Forest's splendid motives, but we must direct our prayers aright, according to the Divine Word, otherwise we cannot expect an answer.

WHAT THE FARMER CAN DO WITH CONCRETE

Concrete Fence Posts Last Forever

THEY never rot away in the ground. They stand the hardest knocks and never have to be replaced, for they are practically everlasting. They are easily and cheaply made and are the most satisfactory of all fence posts.

Concrete Drain Tile Cannot Decay

Concrete drains do not decay and are cheaper, because they do not crumble and stop up drains, hence they need no digging up or relaying.

Let us send you this free book, "What the Farmer can do with Concrete." It shows you how to make concrete fence-posts and will save you many dollars when doing other building 'round the farm.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

EXILED BRITONS' WAR GIFT.

The three million British subjects who are living and trading abroad outside the Empire are to be invited to emulate the example of British Dominions by subscribing for the gift of a warship to the British fleet.

A fund is being raised for this purpose by the Patriotic League of Britons Over-seas. The King is patron of the league. Lord Selborne is chairman, Lord Aldenham fills the posts of vice-chairman and honorary-treasurer, and the influential committee which has been formed includes the names of Lord Curzon of Kedleston, Lord Milner, Lord Beresford, Sir Gerard Lowther, Sir Claude M. MacDonald and Sir H. M. Durand.

The widely scattered communities of Britons who are to be found in the United States, in the Far East, in Chili, and in the Argentine, and elsewhere are all anxious to do something for the Motherland in her hour of need. Working individually, the efforts of these communities are circumscribed, being limited usually to the equipping of small parties of men who have volunteered for service in Europe, and the collection of money for the various war funds. The Patriotic League, by co-ordinating their local effort, will enable these widely dispersed subjects of the King to afford the world a visible proof of the solidarity of the British race.

The proposal of the League has the cordial support of the Admiralty. The type of ship will, of course, depend on the amount subscribed, but the Admiralty have agreed to apply the money to one of the larger ships now under construction or to "making an addition to a class of cruisers most useful in seas abroad."

Prominent business people in the City, with large interests abroad are heartily backing the league. Already branches are being formed throughout the world, and 100,000 copies of the League's proposals have been despatched from the headquarters office at 80 Bishopsgate, E.C.

A PERSISTENT HERO.

The following is the story told by a comrade of the incident which won for Sergeant Harlock, 113th Battery, R. F. A., the Victoria Cross:

"We were in action in an open field and it was hot, I can tell you—'Jack Johnsons' and shrapnel. One shell burst right under Bombardier Harlock's gun, and cut the trail in two, clean, and killed the Number One. Harlock got splinters in his right thigh. He went to the dressing station and the doctor dressed him and told him to get into the ambulance and go to the hospital.

"Well, Harlock goes outside, but he doesn't look for any ambulance, but comes back to the battery. Hang me! he hadn't been there five minutes before he got it in the back. Down he walked once more to the dressing station, and when he was dressed the doctor puts him in charge of an orderly. The pair set out, but Harlock pointed out to the orderly that the doctor seemed a bit 'narked,' and that there were plenty of men who wanted an orderly's attention more than he did, and if the orderly went back to the dressing station he (Harlock) could find his way all right.

"The orderly agreed about it, but says to Harlock, ' No jokes, mind, or you'll get me into trouble. You go straight to the hospital.' Harlock said 'Good morning,' but thought if he could walk to the hospital, he could just as easily go back to old 113th. So back he came again, and he hadn't been with us five minutes before he got some splinters in his arm. It was rotten luck, and he was afraid to go back to the doctor again, so he just stayed there till we went out of action in the evening.

"Some of our officers saw the doctor that night and told him about Harlock, and then they had him down and reprimanded him. But I think they had their tongues in their cheeks when they did it. Anyhow, he's promoted sergeant and got the V. C."

BRAVE DRUMMER V. C.

Drummer Spenser John Bent, one of the new V.C.'s, has passed three weeks of convalescence in the village of Witnesham, near Ipswich. A strapping young fellow, he gave the following account of his brave deeds.

"It was about October 22nd. We'd had a month in the trenches. On the right there was a small advance trench with six men and a corporal in it. We came to hear that they were short of ammunition. I was in the big trench, removing the earth which a 'Jack Johnson' had thrown up.

"The officer asked, 'Who'll take some ammunition?' Well, I thought, I'm the only fellow doing nothing, and I might just as well volunteer. Buglers and drummers are generally noncombatants. I simply took about 400 rounds to the corporal, who said they'd hang hang on all night. Then I came back." "Through the shrapnel?" he was asked. "Yes, through the shrapnel," came the matter-of-fact reply. "Two days later I had the same sort of job.

"The fighting went on. Officers fell, sergeants got hit, separated, or what not. We were in the trenches firing in the moonlight, and jolly hard pressed. Somehow we'd lost our officers. I was at the end of our trench. Suddenly round the corner came a man who flopped down flat. In a jiffy I had my rifle on him.

"'Who are you?' I said, thinking he was a spy, and he answered, 'For Heaven's sake, Bent, stop this retirement and get hold of the men.' Poor Sergeant —— got it shortly after. Our lads were a bit shaky. 'Come on, boys,' I said, 'Carry on now and play the game.' They stuck it like bricks until C and D Companies came up and then the officers took command. No! Only an hour or two was all the time I led them."

Asked about his rescue of wounded men, Drummer Bent said: "Oh, I only picked up a few men. I went to one, picked him up, and started back. The enemy fired a volley at us. We dropped flat. I tucked my toes under his armpits and dragged him, tugged him along, lying on my back and pushing with my hands. After thirty yards of that we found a ditch, and then a pal rushed up and helped me, so we got him to the ambulance."

25TH VICTORIA CROSS.

The 25th Victoria Cross awarded since the beginning of the war was announced in a supplement of the London Gazette on Saturday, as follows:

To LIEUTENANT WALTER LORRAIN BRODIE, 2nd Battalion Highland Light Infantry.

For conspicuous gallantry near Becelaere on November 11 in clearing the enemy out of a portion of our trenches which they had succeeded in occupying. Heading the charge he bayoneted several of the enemy and thereby relieved a dangerous situation.

As a result of Lieutenant Brodie's promptitude, 80 of the enemy were killed and 51 taken prisoners.

WAR SPIRIT OF SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh and Leith have provided over 18,000 recruits for the new Armies and Regular Forces, and the Admiralty prohibition of fishing in the Firth of Forth has resulted in over 300 fishermen joining the Royal Naval Reserve during the past ten days.

The villages as well as the big towns of Scotland have given freely of their men. Every man of military age in Spott (Haddington) village has joined the colors.

MAN WHO READ OF HIS DEATH.

Private F. Nailor, of the Royal Berkshires, was at his home at Sandhurst on Saturday week, when the postman brought a letter from the War Office reporting that he was killed in action on November 1st.

He had been shot in the head and removed to the Princess Louise Hospital, London. He returns to his regiment shortly.

RAPID PROMOTION.

Two months ago Color-Sergeant E. J. Evans, of Oswestry, was promoted to a lieutenancy in the Shropshire Light Infantry. He had just received his captaincy in the 11th Staffordshire Regiment, in which he is now serving in Jersey. Captain Evans was one of eight British army instructors sent to Tokio to instruct the Japanese army.

NOTES.

Drummer Bent is the recipient of £50 offered by Mr. T. Curtis, an Ipswich resident, for the first man from the city to obtain the V. C.

Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Alves, of Tunbridge Wells, entertained 2,500 Territorials to dinner in that town on Christmas day.

It is understood that in the course of his inspection of training camps for the new army the King will pay a visit to Ireland.

At an expenditure of £350,000, some forty thousand troops are to be quartered a mile or so of Ripon, and a light railway is to be built to give access for supplies.

The war on Germany's chemical trade has created a great demand for English chemists, dye and drug firms having three posts vacant for every two that under existing conditions can adequately be filled.

In one year no less a sum than £10,771 has been handed over by Mr. Oswald Stoll to various charitable organizations and institutions as the result of entertainments given at the Coliseum and other theatres under his control.

The headmaster of the Portmadoc Intermediate School, where Miss Lloyd George distributed the prizes on the occasion of the annual speech-day, said that one of the fifty old boys of the school had just struck a rich vein of gold in the Rocky Mountains when a passing Indian told him of the war. He dropped his tools, came home forthwith, and is now serving with the colors as second lieutenant.

An old soldier who lives at Fulham, Lance-Corporal J. J. Farmer, V. C., has five sons serving the King: Color-Sergeant J. O. Farmer, 25th County of London Cyclists; Sergeant F. C. Farmer, 1st East Surrey Regiment; Leading Drummer T. J. Farmer, 31st Battalion Canadian Regiment; Leading Seaman F. R. Farmer, Royal Naval Division, and Private H. G. Farmer, Royal Marine Light Infantry.

A farm servant, named John Davies, who enlisted at Wellington, Shropshire, in the Army Service Corps, makes the seventeenth brother in one family in the army. Two are in Lord Kitchener's army, two in the Welsh Fusiliers, and twelve in the King's Shropshire Light Infantry. Fourteen of the seventeen are on active service. Sergeant Davies, the father, died in India, while serving in the Shropshire Regiment.

The spirit of patriotism runs strong in the family and connections of Mr. George Burnett, sub-librarian of the Royal Literary and Scientific Institution, Bath. Of Mr. Burnett's relatives—sons, brothers, nephews, etc.—23 have served or are serving their country. Twelve of these men are now at the front, one is on staff duty, six have been in long service and are now are too old, and three are dead. Mr. Burnett, who is seventy-four, also saw active service in India.

At Blackpool James Hargreaves, a retired solicitor, was committed for trial on a charge of wilful murder in connection with the death of Frank Hinchcliffe, aged 20, clerk.

The estate of the late Mr. Richard Cory, of Oscar House, Cardiff, chairman of Messrs. Cory Brothers & Co., colliery owners and coal exporters, who died on Sept. 29, has been provisionally estimated at about £700,000.

The death occurred at Glasnevin, Dublin, of Col. Gore Lindsay, a Crimean and Indian mutiny veteran and ex-chief constable of Glamorgan, aged 84. Col. Gore Lindsay married Miss Ella Morgan, sister of the late Lord Tredegar, who predeceased him.

Awakened by cries for help a mess steward, dressed only in pyjamas, dived into Harwich harbor early on Saturday week morning and rescued from drowning a naval officer who had taken part in the action off Heligoland Bight. The officer fell overboard after stumbling on the deck.

At the annual show of the Suffolk Fat Cattle Club at Ipswich Mr. J. J. Cridlan's Smithfield champion Aberdeen-Angus Estelle of Maisemore took the champion trophy. As her owner had won the trophy twice before it now becomes his absolute property. The champion beast, in spite of her trying week at Smithfield, had only lost ten pounds in weight.

Much damage has been caused by floods in the Isle of Wight owing to the heavy rain last week. The roadways and railways in many parts were submerged, and traffic on the Newport to Sandown Railway was suspended. In some cases the water was level with the railway station platforms.

The Liverpool Health Committee recommended a vote of £100 to send a Christmas box to each of its 700 employees who are wearing the King's uniform.

War medals were presented by the Northampton Christmas dinner fund to every Northampton child between the ages of three and fourteen whose father is serving with the forces. The medals are engraved on the reverse, "A Recognition of My Father's Patriotism."

Another huge fall of cliff has occurred on the Sussex coast between Beachy Head and Seaford.

The Roman Catholic Church at Mortomley, near Chapeltown, has been burned down.

The president of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries has appointed Mr. Edwin John Cheney, lately one of the assistant secretaries of the department, to the office of chief agricultural adviser to the board.

The London Gazette announces that the King has awarded the Imperial Service Medal to Mr. Alfred Hooper on account of his long and meritorious service as inspector of shipping (War Department vessels).

Shipbuilders on the northeast coast have so many orders booked that few can now take contracts for delivery this year.

A cigar that once belonged to the German Emperor fetched £11 10s. at Netley, being sold several times in aid of the funds of the local Red Cross Hospital.

Fred McLachlan, second engineer of the steamship Vedra, the benzine ship which took fire off Barrow, has died in hospital at Barrow. This brings the number of victims to 22.

The suggestion to alter German street names in London is discountenanced by the Local Government Committee of the London County Council, who point out that in the case of Berlin road, Catford, the occupiers have voted against any alteration.

The United Kingdom holds sufficient pit timber to yield an eighteen months' supply, says the Forestry Branch of the Board of Agriculture, and while there is no cause for anxiety steps should be taken to encourage additional supplies from Canada and Newfoundland for future requirements.

The death rate in the 97 great towns of England and Wales last week averaged 13.7 per 1,000.

The Rev. C. Higgins has intimated to the officials of the Hoyle street Primitive Methodist Circuit, Sheffield his intention to leave the circuit at the Conference of 1916. Changes will also take place in the Abbeydale road Circuit, the Rev. J. R. Trammer removing to Manchester and the Rev. J. Maland to Rotherham at the same Conference.

A proposal to spend £150,000 on improving the navigation of the Trent and converting Nottingham into a port was negatived by the Corporation, there not being the necessary majority for seeking Parliamentary powers.

As The Result
Of a Neglected Cold He Contracted
SEVERE BRONCHIAL TROUBLE.

Mr. W. T. Allen, Halifax, N.S., writes: "I feel that I would be doing you and your great remedy, Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, a gross injustice if I did not write and let you know the wonderful results that I have obtained from its use.

"Last spring I happened to contract a cold. Of course, this is a common occurrence, and I did not take any particular notice of it at the time. However, it did not break up as quickly as colds generally did with me, so after two weeks, and no sign of improvement, I began to get alarmed, and went to my local physician who informed me that I had contracted severe bronchial trouble as a result of neglecting my cold. He prescribed some medicine for me, which I took for about two weeks without any sign of improvement. I was getting pretty much discouraged by this, but one day a friend happened to be in to whom I was telling my trouble, and he advised me to try Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, saying that he had obtained very beneficial results from its use in a similar case. I took his advice and procured several bottles from my druggist. After taking it, according to directions, for about two days, I noticed a decided improvement, and from that day on I began to get better, and in ten days I was in my usual health. I consider this an excellent showing for your remedy, and can highly recommend it to anyone afflicted as I was. I shall always put in a good word for it whenever the opportunity offers itself."

You can procure Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup from any druggist or dealer. Price, 25c and 50c. The genuine is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Was Troubled With Nervous Prostration.

Many people although they know of nervous prostration do not know what the symptoms are. The principal ones are a feeling of fright when in crowded places, a dread of being alone, fear of being in a confined place, a horror of society, a dread of things falling from above, fright at travelling on railroad trains, and electric cars, restless, unrefreshing sleep, often troubled with dreams.

Mrs. [illegible], Victoria Harbor, Ont., writes:—"I am writing to tell you of the great success I have had with Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. I was so nervous I could not do my own work, [illegible] or would I [illegible]. My nerves were bad for three years, and my heart was so bad it made me tremble all over. I took three boxes of your pills and I never was better than I am now. I weigh 20 pounds more than I ever did."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Jewels! Which to Wear and When to Wear Them

Lessons From Irene Hough's Beauty

(The Most Beautiful Telephone Girl in America.)

Irene Estelle Hough.

EARRINGS ALWAYS MAKE ONE LOOK OLDER.

(By Idah McGlone Gibson)

A girl and every woman should be very particular when choosing jewelry.

Nothing that a woman wears makes or mars her beauty more than the little gewgaws she hangs about her neck, the jewels she puts in her ears, or the bracelets and rings with which she decorates her arms and hands.

These facts were brought home to me most forcibly when I saw Miss Irene Hough, America's most beautiful telephone girl, wearing jet earrings.

However, when she appeared wearing long ear drops of jet, although she had not changed the dressing of her hair or in any other she looked like a vivacious gypsy.

Earrings nearly always make one look older, so women, unless they would try for the grand dame effect, should be very careful when they wear them.

Once when Ethel Barrymore was playing the mother of a grown daughter, one of the ways in which she added to her age was by wearing long, gold and jet earrings.

If your eyes are light and rather lacking in expression don't wear diamond earrings even if you can afford them.

If you have the deep coloring that comes at middle age don't wear coral earrings, and above all, do not wear those little dark, pink coral beads in a pink ear. They look like warts.

If you are sure you have a "peaches and cream" complexion, wear pearl earrings.

A girl with a gypsy cast of features and dark complexion looks well in gold loop earrings.

Pearl beads are becoming to most any throat that is not wrinkled and old, and a thin gold chain with a pretty locket or other ornament on it is always good taste.

Many bracelets and rings are vulgar.

One or two good rings are sufficient to wear at one time. Bracelets, with the exception of the bracelet watch, are now out of style. However, with the harking back to the mid-Victorian styles, we are sure to soon resume wearing bracelets.

Personally, I am much more in favor of wearing bracelets than earrings, for, while the bracelet is a remembrance of the time when our men were slaves and wore bands about their arms, with the names of their masters thereon, the earring is of still older and more barbarous origin.

It comes from the time when we wore rings in our noses and lips, as well as our ears!

THE HOME OF THE EMERALD

Mount Zabarah, in Upper Egypt, is said to have been the source of many emeralds, but centuries have passed since these prolific mines were exhausted and modern jewelers must now depend upon the Western Hemisphere for their supply. In the spoils Pizarro sent to Spain, so goes the story in the Spanish edition for May of the monthly bulletin of the Pan-American Union, were found the first fine specimens of American emeralds and thus was revealed another source of the manifold wealth of the New World. Perhaps the most valuable single emerald found in modern times is the one in the famous collection of gems owned by the Duke of Devonshire. It is said to be a perfect hexagonal crystal weighing eight ounces and eighteen pennyweight and two inches in length. It came from the mines of Colombia, and it is this South American republic that furnishes the greatest supply of the emeralds known to the world today.

Not that Colombia is the only country that has emerald mines. Ecuador and Peru have contributed their share of the world's supply, and in the former country the city of Esmeraldas (Spanish for emeralds) takes its name from the precious stones found in its vicinity. Among the Aztec treasures of Mexico were found emeralds as fine as those of the Peruvian Incas, and it is reported that Cortez was offered [illegible] for one of the gems he gathered from the hoard of Montezuma. The Mexican gems were exquisitely cut, and it is from this source that the magnificent emeralds now forming part of the royal collection of Spain were supposed to have come. In certain parts of Siberia, India, Salzburg, in Austria, Australia, Norway, Brazil, Ireland, and in some areas of the United States limited quantities of the precious stones are found, but the gems of greatest beauty and value are to be had from the Muzo and Cosquez deposits near Bogota, the capital of Colombia.

The Colombian gems excel to the highest degree the qualities of color, brilliancy, flawlessness and size characteristic of the best emeralds known, and the Muzo district seems at present to be the most prolific of all mining regions. The matrix in which they are imbedded overlies a great province of black shale or slate. This black rock contains but few stones. They are found for the most part in white calcite running in veins through this slate, some being embedded in the matrix and others lying in pockets. These rocks dip in every direction, evidently as the result of repeated volcanic action, and the strata are traversed by cracks or small fissures, which have been filled up by infiltration with silica, alumina, lime and magnesia, with a little chrome and other minerals, including pyrite. Under great heat and pressure these minerals in the fissures or veins crystallized in different forms according to the various minerals contained. Thus, it is supposed, have emeralds been formed in these veins, the tint being due to the presence of chrome in sufficient quantities. All of the Colombian mines are situated within a radius of 100 miles of Bogota, at altitudes between 2,500 and 7,500 feet above sea level. It is estimated that the annual production is not far from $1,000,000 in value. An English syndicate has the exclusive concession for mining these valuable stones, under strict governmental supervision, and the actual figures of the annual output have not been revealed in recent years.

SEA CONTROL ESSENTIAL.

(Brantford Expositor)

The people of the British Empire have learnt much during the last three months and will learn more still, before the war is over, as to the true source of their strength. Command of sea, now as always, stands between the Empire and destruction. Command of sea is all that separates victory from disaster. So long as the British navy commands the sea, the British Empire cannot be defeated. If it loses command of the sea, the Empire cannot win. All discussion of financial, trading or other war problems must finally come down to that simple elementary truth and it would be well were it burnt into the mind of every subject of the King throughout the world.

GERMANY'S SEA PLANS.

(New York Sun)

It seems to be a reasonable conclusion from the disaster to the Formidable that the German tactics [illegible] directly directed against British warships in Channel waters with the purpose of "holding up" troops transportation and ultimately frustrating attempts to land the full strength of reinforcements in France. The risk will have to be taken by the British authorities, however; such is the necessity of a decisive campaign in Flanders. The naval phase of the war is at present of secondary importance from the British point of view.

THE BATTLESHIP THE THING.

(Chicago Tribune)

The British have gained their successes almost entirely by gun fire, the Germans by mines and submarines. The results thus far do not indicate that the effectiveness of the latter type is as yet at all in proportion to the effect on the imagination of laymen. Although employed under the most favorable conditions in this war, its destructiveness has fallen far short of the claims of its champions and the primacy of the battleship is still to be shaken.

Our First Contingent

They Were Only Seven, But They Heard the Empire's Call

CHARLES STOKES IN CANADIAN COURIER

We sent only seven. But then the population of our town consists of only 300, fully half of whom are women and children, so that our contribution to Canada's contingent was approximately one man from every twenty.

It is a far cry from Alberta's sunlit plains to the battlegrounds of Europe—so far, indeed, that a commotion, to produce ripples upon the pool of our placid existence, needed to be of the present magnitude. Factions may rage, politicians, even dynasties, may rise and fall; but a remote little village on a branch railway line on the prairies, with only one train a day to connect it with the world in which wars are declared and battles are fought, and weekly newspapers are two days late, such a village is apt to get out of touch with world events unless they are really striking.

That is, perhaps, why our town regarded most European events almost entirely from the standpoint of spectators. The Irish question, the suffragette question, were both merely topics for debate, with as much bearing upon life as, say, such other debating topics as the justifiability of the execution of Charles I. Compared with the prospects of a good crop, the late Irish crisis ranked as a very decided also-ran; and the price of grain or the architecture of the new schoolhouse completely ousted the suffragettes as a popular discussion. Why, we did not even know that the Archduke What's-his-name was killed until two days later, and it must be confessed, until then none of us had known he had existed; but then, you see, we live on a branch line on the prairies.

And yet, the call to arms, when it did reach us, ran through our small community as a flame runs through a pile of shavings. In some psychic way it thrilled our enthusiasm; I say "psychic," because it penetrated the abysmal depths of our indifference to outside affairs. A few of us had come from the old land; about one-third came from that rather vague locality known as "down east"; a few were Americans, and a sprinkling were foreign—two Dutchmen, one Frenchman, and three or four Russians.

We did not have to wait until two days after to learn that war had been declared; the lone telegraph clerk at the station picked the news hot off the wires the same night, and it was all over town in ten minutes. We were all sitting up for it, as a matter of fact. It came late, as you will remember—late, that is, for us, for it was close upon midnight. In the lobby of the Pioneer Hotel scenes of what might be called the wildest enthusiasm were to be witnessed. Two flags were to be seen—one, a Canadian ensign, hastily requisitioned from the schoolhouse, and the other presented by Seth Long, our oldest farmer. Seth Long—he now calls himself a "rancher" since the new kind of small farmer began to come in—made a speech as well as presenting a Union Jack. There must have been at least eight people in the Pioneer that night, and that is "going some" considering the size. We all sang "God Save the King" and the "Maple Leaf" and "Rule Britannia."

But it was when our seven boys enlisted that we felt the nearness of war. The nearest recruiting station was forty miles away, where the branch line joined the main line; and on the following day nine of our young men slipped away privily on the only train. Gossip was busy during their absence, for the news quickly leaked out! They returned two days later. Seven of them tried to look as if they did not know people were looking at them as they stepped off the car; the other two were downcast because, for some reason or other, they had not been accepted. The lucky seven were to report again on the Saturday of the following week.

Who were these seven? Two were farmers, one a young man recently started for himself, the other a farm laborer. Another was a clerk in our only bank. Two were clerks in stores—one a blacksmith, the last a doctor. Three of them were English, one Scotch, two Canadians, and the seventh—well, he was the brightest particular jewel, for he was an American who had just taken out his naturalization papers as a Canadian subject. Only one of them—the blacksmith—had ever been in an actual fighting force before; he was an ex-trooper sergeant in a famous cavalry regiment. But one of the other Britishers had served his time in the old Volunteers.

War wrecks all human plans. Not one of these seven but already had the respect or liking of every person in town; and in two cases, at least, closer and softer relations were known to be contemplated. But in public the persons most concerned, despite certain curious glances cast in their direction, betrayed no other emotion than pride—pride that was shared by us all, because our boys had heard the motherland's call

"Ladies of desk and wheel and loom,
Noble and trader, squire and groom,
Come where the bugles of England play,
Over the hills and far away."

The following week saw the seven heroes going about their ordinary business, and winding up their affairs, until nearly the close. But on Friday night our over-pent feelings found vent in a little complimentary banquet to them at the Pioneer, a banquet held in a flag-festooned dining room, and characterized by a little oratory, from Seth Long and others. At its close, indiscriminate and prolonged handshaking was, as our weekly paper would say, "the order of the day." The seven bore the brunt—why, I do not know, because it was not the final leave-taking, for everyone was intending to go down to the station the next day to see them off—but the habit spread, and we were all shaking hands with one another.

Our only train goes through at 2.30 in the afternoon, and by common consent all business was suspended after twelve on Saturday. Our brass band, consisting of ten players, was on duty long before that time, and, with only a short interval for lunch, filled the air with martial music, parading up Main street and back again. By two practically the whole population was at the station. Four of our contingent were already there; a few minutes after appeared the bank clerk, escorted by his colleagues and staggering under a very big pile of baggage. Next came the young farmer; he was one of those whom clinging arms might have restrained, and one of the arms was, indeed, thrust through his own. The blacksmith was the last, and he bore the least baggage of anyone.

Such a crowd! You would have thought it was a picnic, such was the laughter, the handshaking. Thousands of messages were sent to relatives in the old country. It is very improbable whether their bearers have ever come within one hundred miles of their intended recipients; promises to send back picture postcards and letters were freely if somewhat rashly given.

A murmur of appreciation ran through our ranks. A figure in black hobbled up the wooden sidewalk to the station. It was the priest in charge of the small Catholic mission in the neighborhood. Father Lefere was universally beloved, not because we were of the same faith, but because he was a kindly old man, who went about doing good. With a beaming smile he took each of the seven by the hand and addressed a few words of farewell to them. The women left behind he also comforted.

The band meanwhile was covering itself with glory, its rendering of the "Maple Leaf" being especially admired. But time was flying by; it wanted now but five minutes to train time, and the baggage man had already wheeled out his truck to where the door of the baggage car would approximately come to a standstill. The station agent had his orders all ready for the conductor.

In the distance was suddenly heard the clangor of a bell. Across the prairie was seen a trail of black smoke. A quick spasm went through the crowd, and the hand-shakings were frenziedly resumed. Then, as suddenly, the train drew alongside—on time, as usual. Two or three passengers alighted. The brass band immediately struck up again, and everybody on board the train crowded to the windows to see what was the matter. We could imagine them saying to themselves, "Why, it's the boys going to the war—seven of them"; and bearing the tale back with them to be in their flowing cups freshly remembered. A lane was made through the throng for the seven to enter the car, and to deposit their grips and bags. Then they reappeared.

The conductor was kind to us, for he delayed the departure of the train as much as he conscientiously could. But at last he had to shout "All aboard!" "Good-bye!" we cried, as our heroes climbed the steps. Hands were again thrust out and shaken by whoever could grasp them. Last embraces and last kisses were given. Then a sudden silence fell on everyone, as Father Lefere advanced. He extended his hands and gave them a blessing, and made the sign of the cross, and every head was bared "not," as someone said afterwards, "because we believed it, but because an old man's blessing could hurt no one." Then the band blared forth again, the conductor and the brakeman sprang aboard, the bell clanged, the whistle hooted, the wheels began to revolve, handkerchiefs were fluttered, "Good luck!" "Be with you soon in Berlin!" "Oh, you kid!" and other endearing farewells shouted, and the train was gone, taking with seven of the flower of our manhood to fight for the cause of right and liberty. There was very little work done in the town that afternoon.

It was a little foolish, perhaps, and the tears that were furtively wiped away afterwards were rather silly. Our best was but tiny. God knows when, if ever, we shall see them back again; but in any case we gave them to the motherland with joy, with pride, with a deep sense of gratitude and duty, and if we had had seventy-thousand times seven to give instead of seven we would have given them.

REMARKABLE INSECTS.

Faculty of Smell is the Most Highly Developed.

The most valuable faculty possessed by insects is their sense of smell. Most insects hear very poorly, and ants in particular are absolutely deaf. With all their batteries of eyes bulging in every direction these creatures do not seem to enjoy very good eyesight. Some of the flying insects cannot see well enough to avoid obstacles which to them should look as big as a barn.

But when it comes to the sense of smell the insect world is far ahead of any animal. Fabre, the great French entomologist, confined some female moths in a steel cage far from the natural haunts of the insects. To his surprise males of the species came from miles away and lit on the screen.

He then confined the females in hermetically-sealed jars and placed them near places frequented by the males. Not one paid any attention, though the females were visible through the glass.

To make sure that the sense of smell was the guiding force, Prof. Fabre brought out some bits of paper and twigs on which the females had rested. Males soon appeared, and, ignoring the females in their glass jars, circled about the twigs and paper.

If a strange ant of the same species is placed in an ant-hill he is violently attacked. Every insect he meets recognizes him instantly as an intruder and helps in the ejection.

If a small mouse dies in a field certain undertakers known as sylphids and necrophori will journey from distances of more than a mile to lay eggs in the body.

The house fly gets about on the sense of smell. In his flying about he is periodically trying to head in the direction of each breath of food odor he meets, and dodges and turns with each eddy of air until he locates the source of the smell.

Mosquitoes find you in the dark rather more easily than in the day. They smell their victims outside the house. Their sense of smell leads them to windows, doors or chimneys. In they go and soon you hear their tune about your ears.

"I hear you are an actor. What do you do?" "I'm a contortionist. They call me 'The Human Frog.'" "Oh, then, shall I see you at the hop?"—Brooklyn Citizen.

TORTURE OF SCIATICA CURED QUICK! "NERVILINE" A SUCCESS EVERY TIME

Sciatica is the most severe pain man can suffer. The great sciatic nerve is deeply placed, and you can reach it only by a pain remedy, as penetrating and as powerful as NERVILINE.

The glory of Nerviline is in its strength—in its marvelous power of penetrating deeply. In severe pains, such as sciatica and neuralgia, NERVILINE demonstrates its superiority over every other remedy.

Extraordinary pains, such as rheumatic or sciatica, can be overcome only by a remedy as extraordinary as Nerviline. In many lands it has shown itself to be the best for little pains, best for big pains, and best for all pains.

When one has acute rheumatic pains, stiff joints or a stiff neck, don't experiment—seek a remedy that cures. Like lightning in rapidity, as sure as fate in its certainty of relief, Nerviline can never be surpassed for the removal of pain, no matter what advance science may make. It is perfection in its line. Do not trifle with ordinary or oily liniments, use Nerviline. Prove its efficacy—it's the one liniment that rubs right into the core of the pain.

A large 50-cent bottle will cure the aches and pains of the whole family. Trial size, 25 cents. Sold by all dealers everywhere, or the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

FARM AND GARDEN

CARE OF STABLED HORSES.

Just as soon as the horses stop working every day their grain ration should be cut down at least half. A horse when not working really requires but little grain. If the health of the animal is to be maintained the heavy feeding must be discontinued just as soon as the heavy work ceases for without much exercise the horse will not be able to assimilate and properly get rid of the impurities from this amount of feed. Not being cast off, these impurities remain to poison the system of the horse and cause serious illness.

If the horses must remain in the stable during most of their time during winter the stable should be free from drafts or sudden changes of temperature. Colds and chills impair the health of an animal and invite disease, the importance of proper ventilation must not be overlooked.

There are several good systems of ventilation by which good, pure, fresh air can be gotten into the stables without creating a draft or other undesirable condition. Plenty of sunshine in the horses' quarters is a very desirable thing for it not only gives the stable a more pleasant, light, outdoor atmosphere, but also makes it more healthful. Sunshine is a great germ killer, in fact there is no disinfectant to be had that is so effective or cheap as plenty of sunshine. Sunshine is also an enemy to dampness, a very bad thing to have in our stables as it is very injurious to horses. Windows become rain spattered and dulled after a time and it is therefore wise to wash the stable windows a few times a year. It does not take long to do this and the windows when clean admit a great deal more of this valuable sunshine.

Large horses should be given large single stalls, for if we put two in a stall they are liable to be crowded and besides, the more timid of the two is very liable to be robbed of its rest. Then, too, there is danger of injury by kicking, especially when the horses wear sharp shoes. The danger of injuring each other is much greater when they are not worked regularly.

When horses are expected to work off and on during the winter they should be shod with very sharp shoes so as to be ready for the most slippery roads. It is a very dangerous and usually costly practice to force horses over slippery roads and pavements when unshod. Even if the horse does not receive a permanent injury or break its harness, a fall is liable to make the horse very timid, etc. This timidity is often so marked as to cause quite a reduction in the value of the horse, it pays to look out for these little things, for neglect often means the sacrificing of a very valuable animal. If horses have to be worked in very stormy weather it is well to have them wear storm blankets.

Horses cannot enjoy proper rest if they come in with their coats wet with snow and sleet. Besides all day while the horses are working they are suffering with colds and chills. Horses should not be made to stand outside for hours in cold weather. Besides being inhuman, it does not pay. Besides the intense discomfort, chilling retards digestion and impairs the health of the animal. For this reason ice cold water should never be given. Water should be given in the stable and slightly warmed.

Exercise is very essential to the horse's health and on all fair days they should be given the run of an open field. If this practice is started early in the fall the horses become quite hardy and grow long coats of hair so that they do not require blanketing in the stable even on the coldest nights. Horses and colts that are given the run of a field in this way always come through the winter in a strong healthy condition. If the field is rough it does not matter, as the animals develop strong legs and become more sure footed from running on rough and frozen fields.—Wisconsin Agriculturist.

SLOBBERS IN HORSES.

Every boy who has ever pastured horses on a white clover pasture is familiar with slobbers, otherwise known as salivation, or if you want a really scientific term, ptyalism, and if you want to anglicise that, "spittle," or too much saliva. This usually occurs along in August and September, and is believed to be caused by clover seed, especially white clover, alsike and the second growth of red clover.

We have been familiar with this from boyhood up. We have seen brood sows fed on white clover pasture running at the mouth or salivated just like horses, but not quite so badly. We used to give the horses once a day a cutting of what was then known as horse weed, but which is now known as giant rag-weed, a tall form of rag-weed that grows along creek bottoms, or on flat, rich, moist land. We believed then that it stopped the salivation. Possibly it did. It can be stopped temporarily by washing out the mouth with cold water, or giving a dry feed of oats. Possibly washing it out with a weak solution of alum might give temporary relief; but the real point is to take the horses out of the pasture.

Nothing very serious follows this salivation, but it is obvious to anyone that the waste of so much saliva is not good for the horses. Therefore, the best thing to do is to put them on timothy hay or clover hay of any kind in which the seed has not been ripened. We presume that slobbers have much the same effect on the system of the horse that persistent gum chewing has upon people who are addicted to that habit.—Wall.

NOTES.

G. A. Drew, a Connecticut fruit grower, says he fertilizes in connection with cultivation, so the trees will make from eight to ten inches' growth a year, and produce good colored, sound fruit that will stand up. There is nothing nicer than hardwood ashes to give these results, he thinks. Manure is all right in giving growth, but in a bearing orchard it should be used with caution. Among chemical elements he depends on nitrate of soda, but uses it only in small amounts, because of its tendency to produce great foliage and fruit that will not stand up to transportation. For potash, he uses high grade sulphate of potash as an annual dressing, at the rate of 100 to 250 pounds to an acre. For phosphoric acid, he generally plans on giving his orchards an annual dressing of somewhere from 400 to 600 pounds per acre, and he says some of the best growers of peaches and apples in Connecticut are using of as heavy as 1,000 pounds per acre.

RACING UP EIFFEL TOWER.

Peculiar Contest Organized by French Ingenuity.

The ingenuity of the French is constantly exercised in the devising of curious contests in the form of races. One such novel contest was held in Paris, not so very long ago when 300 competitors participated, the object of which was to ascertain who could mount the 729 steps leading to the second platform of the Eiffel Tower, 378 feet high, in the shortest time. Owing to the large number of entries, the contestants, who were of all ages, were divided into four classes—veterans, pupils, amateur and professional pedestrians.

The race began at 9 o'clock in the morning, and in a few minutes the stairs of the tower were swarming with young and old, breathlessly struggling to reach the goal. The record was attained by one Manet, who managed to achieve the run in the short time of 2 minutes and 3 seconds, but he was disqualified for a breach of the rules, and the prize went to a professional, who covered the distance in 3 minutes and 12 seconds, followed by a pupil, who took seven seconds longer.

The Duc de Chartres once organized a race in the forest of Chantilly, in which 25 women and men participated. The curious feature of this contest lay in the circumstance that the competitors were divided in pairs, and that each couple had to join hands at the start, a condition obligatory throughout the race. The course was two and a half miles, and was liberally obstructed with fences, hedges and water jumps, numbering 29 in all. These barriers the competitors were obliged to surmount as best they might, but the breaking of hands meant disqualification.

Each man, however, was permitted to assist his partner over the most awkward obstacles. This strange race proved highly exciting and amusing, the couples coming to grief at the hedges, through which many crawled in a disheveled condition, and at the water jumps, where several had impromptu immersions. It happened, however, that one couple covered the course, under the conditions imposed, in the space of 23 minutes, and to these were presented the first prizes.

The contestants were accompanied by friends in motor cars and on horseback.

Regimental Nicknames.

Many of Britain's finest regiments owe their nicknames to some humorous or adventurous incident in their history. Thus the East Yorkshire Regiment is known as the "Snappers," in memory of an occasion when, their cartridges having failed, they continued to snap their rifles in the face of the advancing enemy with such vigor that they turned tail and fled. The 7th Dragoon Guards own the honorable title of "Strawboots" to the fact that at Warburg, when their boots were worn out they swathed their feet in straw bands; and the 11th Hussars have been "The Cherry Pickers" ever since, it is said, some of them, in the Peninsular war, were captured by the enemy in an orchard.

Even more interesting is the nickname, "Pontius Pilate's Bodyguard," borne by the 1st Foot, of which the following story is told. When the regiment was in French service a dispute arose between it and the Picardy Regiment as to which was the older. The men of Picardy claimed that they were on duty on the night of the crucifixion, whereupon the Britons retorted that they were also on duty and very wide awake when the rivals were sleeping, for they were acting as bodyguard to Pilate himself.

BRUTALITIES BY GERMANS

Nova Scotian Tells of Cases After Visit to Belgium.

Isolated Instances in Great Atrocity of Violation.

Mr. P. F. Lawson, of Berwick, who accompanied the first relief ship, the S. S. Tremorvah, from Nova Scotia to Belgium, has since arriving in Nova Scotia, sent the following statement to A. S. Barnstead, Secretary of Industries and Immigration, Halifax, which he desires published:

"From various parts of the Province of Nova Scotia, and also from New Brunswick, I am receiving letters asking me regarding the truth of the stories of German atrocities in Belgium. Although I accompanied the first relief ship the Tremorvah, and saw evidences of the awful need of the Belgians, and what is also important, saw the splendid manner in which the Relief Commission is doing its work, I have nothing new to add to the stories of atrocities further than to state my belief that none of them have been overdrawn. That children had their hands cut off I know, for I saw three little ones which had been thus horribly mutilated. The noted Brussels surgeon, with whom I talked, and in whose care the little girls were, assured me that he had seen during that first awful rush of the Germans, even worse mutilations than those of the children. I believe him. He was the type of man who commands belief.

"Refugees who are in Rotterdam, and refugees at the camp, also told me stories that I believed. I saw a mother whose little son had been killed before her eyes, not a victim of shell fire, but deliberately murdered by a German soldier. The Germans may say such charges cannot be proven. I only have the weeping mother's story directly told to me and I believed her. Wounded British soldiers told me of having seen disembowelled women. One had seen a baby stuck on a German bayonet in the end of a German rifle. Dozens of stories were told me of the murderous licentiousness of the German soldiers as they quartered in Belgian towns and villages. Of course I can't prove these stories were all true, but anyone who could hear the stories direct, as I have heard them, would believe them as I do.

"It is not stories of mere cases of inhumanity that should move us to greater charity. We should consider them as one great atrocity the awful march through little Belgium which used up or destroyed a people's food, deprived them of their shelter, drove them out with scanty clothing and left millions of women and their babies and feeble old men to starve and suffer during a winter which was just coming on. That was far worse than murder and mutilation."

When washing ratine do not put it through a wringer. After rinsing wring loosely and hang out slightly heavy with water. If washed this way the article will not need much ironing.

If curtain poles or rods are rubbed with hard soap before being put up, the curtains will slip on them easily.

To keep irons from rusting rub with mutton fat and wrap in brown paper before putting away.

To soften brown sugar when it has become lumpy, stand it over a vessel filled with boiling water.

Use a bit of white paper to test an oven. If it turns brown immediately, the oven is too hot.

Save all your thick white paper bags. Stale bread can be made fresh again, by rolling in a damp cloth, placing in a paper bag and putting in the oven. Before the bag turns brown, remove the bread.

When boiling corned beef, leave two carrots in the water, and let the meat stand in it till cold. The carrots absorb the salt and then the liquor can be made into soup.

Camphor will remove white spots from the furniture, and it will also take out fresh peach stains from table linen if the camphor treatment is followed by soap and water.

To clean fly specks from varnished wood, wipe with a soft cloth dipped in equal parts of skimmed milk and water.

To pick up little pieces of broken glass, wet a woolen cloth; lay it on the floor where the fragments are and pat it. The little particles will adhere to the damp cloth.

Few districts can offer such opportunities to the sportsman as the wild country around the Yellowhead Pass, the rugged territory in the Rocky Mountains on the eastern border of British Columbia. This country has not been much frequented by the white hunter hitherto, owing to the difficulty of access. To gain the pass it was necessary to embark upon a pack train journey from Edmonton. Twelve miles a day of ten hours was reckoned fast travelling. This state of affairs, however, has now become a thing of the past, for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway has been pushed through this pass, and the adjacent country is now accessible.

In the Yellowhead Pass district caribou, deer, mountain goat and sheep afford plenty of exciting sport. They require careful stalking, for they frequent the rugged mountain slopes well up near the timber line. Perhaps the greatest excitement is provided by bears, grizzly and silver tip. The country is piled up with a maze of dead burned trees, uprooted and stacked criss-cross. These, combined with the dense undergrowth, render it an ideal haunt for big game. Often when climbing over a deadfall you may come unawares on a black or grizzly bear. The latter species is especially a tough customer to meet in an awkward corner. Tackling a full-grown grizzly, especially when he is wounded, calls for a certain amount of nerve, particularly at close range. So far as fishing is concerned, there is also ample sport, the catch comprising for the most part rainbow and speckled trout, the Dolly Varden trout, pike, salmon trout and in the neighborhood of Tete Jaune Cache, salmon, for these fish travel as far up the Fraser as this point to spawn on the sandbars. The country is freely intersected with creeks and mountain streams feeding the Athabasca, Smoky, Moose and Fraser Rivers.

IF YOUR HEAD ACHES AND YOUR EARS BUZZ YOU SURELY HAVE CATARRH

It doesn't matter how long you have suffered, or how often you have failed to get relief—even though Catarrh may affect every organ in your body, you can be permanently cured by inhaling the soothing vapor of Catarrhozone.

A few breaths through Catarrhozone Inhaler clears the phlegm out of the throat and stops your cough. The nostrils are cleansed of offensive mucous discharge, and sneezing and snuffling stop at once. Partial loss of hearing and headache, every common symptom of catarrh, are quickly cured, and in a short time every trace of catarrh disappears.

Nothing can be simpler or more pleasant than Catarrhozone. Its healing piney vapor sends a warm cleansing sensation through all the air passages in the head and throat—makes you feel better in half a minute.

"My ears buzzed by the hour and I had frightful head noises," writes J. P. Purdy, from Port Huron. "Catarrh fairly filled my whole head and throat. I got relief mighty fast when I tried Catarrhozone, it hit the spot instantly. Yes! Catarrhozone has cured me and I simply swear by it."

Get the complete $1.00 outfit; it does the trick in a hurry—never fails; small size 50c; trial or sample size 25c, sold by all dealers everywhere.

IN THE POULTRY WORLD

PULLETS OR HENS?

Let us take the case of a beginner who wishes to buy pullets for layers. He should take only pullets hatched within the period which has been specified for their kind, and well grown for their age. Beware of taking later pullets on the seller's assurance that with extra good care and a little feeding they can easily be got to laying in season to make them profitable egg producers. Beware, also, of pullets that have not made good growth for their age. Pullets stunted in the early weeks or months of their lives rarely overcome that setback, no matter how good the care and food.

A matter of much importance to the buyer of laying stock is the price. It is frequently stated that early hatched pullets are worth $1.50 to $2, or even $2.50 each for egg production alone. Such statements are, on their face, absurd, and very few hens are sold for layers at such prices. Persons who buy hens for laying purposes only, at such figures, pay an excessive price for them. The reasoning which these figures have been supported looks so plausible to the novice that it may be worth something to him to have the fallacy of it exposed here. Assuming that the pullet will lay, say, twelve dozen eggs within a year after beginning, that the eggs will sell for twenty-five cents a dozen (about the average for strictly fresh eggs near the eastern cities), and that then the hen sold for poultry will bring enough to pay for what it cost to keep her; it is argued that the owner of the hen cannot afford to sell her for less than $2 or $2.50. In other words, it will pay him better to keep the hen than to sell her for a lower price. But the question for the buyer is to buy the hen at such a figure that he can make something on her before her brief period of usefulness is over. Obviously if he pays $2 to $2.50 for a hen she will have to be an extraordinary layer to bring in enough eggs to pay for herself, and food, housing and care in a year. For egg production alone, the object being to produce eggs for market, one cannot afford to pay much above their value as poultry for pullets. When the pullets are to be used for breeders as well as layers the case bears a different aspect, which need not be considered here.

So conflicting are the opinions of authorities on the question of keeping over old hens as layers that the novice is generally at a loss whose advice to take. Some advise killing all the hens at about a year and a half old, replacing them with pullets of the season. I think that as good a rule for this case as has been offered is one I gave elsewhere some time ago: "One who is producing eggs for market should never dispose of a good layer while in good condition, unless he has more eggs than he can handle, or has another to take her place. Hens which as pullets laid well, kept in good condition, then began to molt early and promise to be in laying trim by Thanksgiving, are always worth keeping unless their room is needed for something you are sure is better property. It is not merely a question of age. This mode of selection might result in keeping some hens until three or four years old, but the proportion of old ones in the flock would never be large, and no old hens that are not good layers need be kept.

As to buying hens for layers. If the hens are certainly known to be young hens (in their second year) and are in promising condition, they might be a good investment. That would depend on whether or not one could get as many pullets of the quality wanted at a reasonable figure. The price, however, ought to be the market price of the hens for poultry. Hens past two years old should not be purchased for layers.

THE STORRS, CONN., CONTEST

Two eggs a week is a better performance than the average hen makes at this season of the year but two eggs in one day is the record of White Leghorn pullet No. 667 owned by Charles Heigl, of Rocky River, Ohio.

The continued cold weather last week seems to have temporarily checked the production. While the yield of 1,492 eggs for all pens was 144 eggs less than the yield for the preceding week it is relatively 165 eggs more than the yield for the corresponding week last year.

The heavier breeds more than held their own during the past week, while the Leghorns and Campines laid nearly 200 eggs less than they did in the preceding week.

Ed Cam's pen of English White Wyandottes won first place for the third successive week with a yield of forty-three eggs.

The ten leading pens to date are as follows:

Ed Cam, Houghton, near Preston, England, White Wyandottes	256
Windsweep Farm, Redding Ridge, Conn., White Leghorns	242
Storrs Experiment Station (sour milk pen) White Leghorns	217
Hillview Poultry Farm, St. Albans, Vt., Rhode Island Reds	210
Merritt M. Clark, Brookfield Centre, Conn., White Leghorns	197
Merritt M. Clark, Brookfield Centre, Conn., Barred Rocks	196
Storrs Experiment Station, White Leghorns	193
Colonial Farm, Temple, N. H., Rhode Island Reds	189
Abney Poultry Farm, Manchester, L. I., White Leghorns	[illegible]
P. G. Platt, Wallingford, Pa., White Leghorns	177

NOTES.

Start the year right by getting good stock, chicks or eggs, and proper poultry equipment. There should be no half-way measure in starting in the poultry game either from a fancy or utility standpoint.

Poultry, to do their best, should be well housed. By that it is not necessary that the building be expensive, but it should be wind and rainproof and so constructed as to give the fowls light and proper ventilation.

The new year will soon begin and the breeding pens should be mated up for the 1915 season. Cull close and allow no fowls in the pens except those that are in good health and are known producers.

The use of the trap nest is the only sure method of picking the hen that laid the greatest number of eggs in the year. Its use has made possible the 200-egg hen. Mere guesswork will never tell heavy layers, and to-day more trap nests are in use than ever before.

That poultry and eggs will command a fair price during 1915 is apparently assured. There is not an over-production of poultry in this country to-day. The shortage of cattle in this country is not a "Beef Trust scare," but an actual fact, borne out by Government figures. Poultry must, in the near future, take the place of other meats to a great extent, and this will mean a demand for the poultry breeders' output at figures that will enable them to make a living profit. There never was a better time to take up poultry in a safe and sane manner than now.

DISEASE IS DUE TO BAD BLOOD

To Cure Common Ailments the Blood Must be Made Rich and Red.

Nearly all the diseases that afflict humanity are caused by bad blood—weak, watery blood, poisoned by impurities. Bad blood is the cause of headaches and backaches, lumbago and rheumatism; debility and indigestion, neuralgia and other nerve troubles, and disfiguring skin diseases like eczema and salt rheum show how impure the blood actually is. No use trying a different remedy for each disease, because they all spring from the one cause—bad blood. To cure any of these troubles you must get right down to the root of the trouble in the blood, and that is just what Dr. Williams' Pink Pills do. They make new, rich blood, and thus cure these diseases when common medicine fails. Mrs. John Jackson, Woodstock, Ont., suffered from both nervous troubles and a rundown condition, and experienced a complete cure through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She says: "I was a sufferer for a number of years from neuralgia, and a general debility of the nerves and system. I had tried several doctors and many medicines, but to no avail, until I began Dr. Williams Pink Pills. At the time I began the pills I had grown so bad that I could hardly be on my feet, and was forced to wear elastic bandages about the ankles. The pain I suffered at times from the neuralgia was terrible. I had almost given up hope when I began the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. In the course of a few weeks I felt an improvement, and I gladly continued the use of the Pills until I was once more quite well and able to attend to all my household duties."

If you are ailing begin to cure yourself to-day with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

OYSTER SHELLS.

Once Little Valued, They Are Now a Boon to Oyster Growers.

Ten years ago any stranger could spot the shore location of an oyster fishery by means of the mammoth piles of oyster shells. These were heaped up on the shore in great stacks sometimes from thirty to forty feet in height. These shells were considered of little value. In many places they were actually given away and they were used to be crushed up and spread over road beds and they were also burned in order to get the lime from them.

To-day these piles have disappeared and if you wanted a ton or so of them you could have to pay a pretty good price, simply because the owners want to dump them back into the sea.

There used to be a great deal of difficulty in procuring oyster "set" for breeding place for the embryo oysters was on the smooth inside surface of the adult oyster shells, and so every year the shells from the shucked oysters are taken up and scattered over the beds. The baby oysters attach themselves to these surfaces and thrive mightily.

There are experts to-day who know nothing of fishing for oysters or marketing them, but who devote all their time to the preparation of artificial oyster beds. This has become a recognized part of the industry. After the shells have been properly spread over the bottom of the water and spawn is liberated upon them and they are left to fight their own battles with the crabs, periwinkles, starfish and other enemies.—Boston Herald.

CHEER UP!

(Brantford Expositor)

Everything points to a gradual improvement in business and it is time to cheer up. We cannot pass through such a tremendous world war without feeling it, and for a while we will all have to curtail our luxuries and pay closer attention to business, but individually we will be benefited by the experience. Let's all cheer up.

ADDITIONAL LOCALS

RECRUITING SLOWLY

One is justified in expressing a doubt that the required number of men for the Third Contingent from Bruce County will be found. At present not half of the number required has been secured in Walkerton and if the other points where there is recruiting in the county do not do much better, relatively speaking than this town, Bruce is going to fall down some on the number wanted. There are times when one would almost wish that there was conscription to get at some of the young loafers who rang about and haven't spunk enough to go round to the recruiting office and get on the roll. Their lives are uninspiring enough at the best as it is, and they might give an excuse for their existence under the flag of the Brit: Empire under which they enjoy the greatest of liberties, if they were at this time of peril and crisis to indicate by enlisting that they appreciate their country and all it stands for. But then it is hard to make a silken purse out of a sow's ear, and the clairvoyant has not yet appeared who could make this particular class, to whom reference is made appear anything but what they are — inconsequential lubbers who exist apparently merely because they can kick their feet under father's table during the hard winter. Otherwise they would starve to death or go to Castle McKechnie. When it comes to a time when only half a hundred men are in sight for a contingent and there are a hundred eligible young unmarried men in Walkerton, it is time for plain speaking. Either there are an awful lot of arrant cowards or there are many men who so little appreciate the country which gives them a livelihood and great personal liberty that the appeal skims off them like water off a duck.

THE WAR SITUATION

During the past month there has been little change in the battle lines in France, Belgium, Russia, Austria or Turkey. All advances which have been made were made by the Allies' armies In Belgium and France the fighting has been severe and the Allies being able to take the German trenches only after desperate encounters and bayonet charges. They, however, are slowly driving the Germans before them. This is being done merely to keep the Kaiser's armies engaged and real war will not commence until Spring when the mighty armies which are at present being mobilized in England, Canada, Australia, France and Japan will concentrate in France and advance against the enemy. The Russians are also playing the waiting game and merely holding the Germans in check, while the Turks and Austrians have been defeated by them with tremendous losses. Recent news from the sea has been confined to the reported sinking of several merchantmen by the British.

Mr. Anthony Zuber who has been suffering from blood poisoning for some two weeks is in a precarious condition and her recovery is not looked for.

Messrs McArthur and Gilson have completely refurnished the second flat of the Central Hotel. Mr. E. Myles the local furniture dealer filled the large order for rugs, furnishings etc.

LEAVE ENGLAND IN 3 WEEKS

According to a statement of General Alderson, the first Canadian contingent which has been training at Salisbury Plain, England, will be in France in three weeks. Although the move across the channel will be carried out in that time, the Canadians may not reach the battle line until some weeks after as it is planned to give them additional training on French soil.

The History of the County of Bruce

And of The
Minor Municipalities Therein
(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)

Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps,
Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

AWARDED CONTRACT

Mr. Jno Sidle was awarded the contract of supplying 30 cords of wood for the town hall and pumping house, by the council on Monday night. Mr. Sidle's price was $2.45 per cord, which was the lowest tender.

SOUTHAMPTON DEFAULTS

The Southampton intermediate hockey team has defaulted the remainder of their games in the districts This action on their part gives Mildmay their two game which practically puts the latter team tied with Port Elgin in the district standing.

PRESENTED WITH HYNM BOOKS

A number of the Women Christian Temperance Union went to the armories to visit the soldiers as they returned from the service in St. Thomas church on Sunday morning and after speaking a few words to them presented each soldier with a copy of Sankey hymns.

MARRIED AT 63.

Mrs. Sterr who has been a resident of Walkerton for some time, was married on Monday last at the home of Mr. Emke, to Mr. A. Raykauph. The bride is 63 years of age while the groom is 65. Mrs. Raykauph has been much married, this being her fourth husband.

HAD FINGER BROKEN

During the Rattan vs. Bobbin factory hockey match, played on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Thos. Singer playing for the Rattan, had the misfortune to have one of his fingers badly broken by being struck with the puck. Mr. Singer's accident will necessitate his being off work for some three weeks at least.

TEN CORDS A DAY.

Messrs. William and Jack Gillen have established a record for wood-cutting. These two youth while working at their home on the 14th con. of Carrick, felled hard-wood trees, sawed them up and split and piled the wood and at the end of ten hours labor, a full day, had a ten-cord pile. Can any two men beat that record.

W.C.T.U. MEETING.

A very successful W.C.T.U. parlor meeting was held at the home of Mrs. Rife on Thursday of last week. Solos were well rendered by Mrs. (Rev.) Hock and Miss Vera Dippel. Mrs. Ashcroft, the county president, gave a very interesting, instructive address. At the close of the meeting Mrs. Rife served a dainty lunch. The local president presided.

COST OF THE WAR

An indication of the amount of the money which the war is costing the Dominion of Canada can be gleaned from the fact that since the recruiting commenced here for the third contingent about $1100 has been paid out by the military authorities. Saturday was pay-day for the volunteers and officers and they received a total amount of nearly $400.00.

BOX SOCIAL.

Don't forget the box social and entertainment under the auspices of Malcolm branch of the United Farmers of Ontario at Malcolm on Friday next, Jan. 29th.

HOCKEY MATCH.

The last district N.H.L. game to be played here will take place on Tuesday evening next, Port Elgin being the visiting team. This will be the game of the season, as Walkerton and Port are almost tied for first place. Don't miss it.

A NIGHT WI' BURNS

The members of the Sons of Scotland held their annual supper on Monday night, January 25th, Burn's anniversary. The members met at their lodge rooms and then adjourned to Erdman's restaurant where a delightful lunch was served by the hostess and presided over by the worthy Chief Jno. Henderson. A stirring address was also given by Bro. Hugh McKerscher who lately returned from Scotland.

KOHER- FOLMER

On Tuesday morning at 9 o'clock, in the R. C. church Chepstow, the marriage of Miss Christine Folmer to Mr. Anthony Koher was solemnized by Rev. Father Goodrow. The bride who was assisted by her sister, Miss Tillie, wore a gown of cream voile and white hat and the bridesmaid was attired in a dress of wisteria silk with hat to match. Mr. Henry Hehn performed a similar duty for the groom. After the ceremony the bridal party repaired to the home of the bride where a pleasant day was spent. Mr. and Mrs. Koher will reside on the groom's farm in Brant.

BROUGHT TO GAOL.

Oliver Cole, of Southampton, was brought to gaol on Monday and was remanded until tomorrow morning 28th inst. on a charge of false pretenses Cole who is a real estate agent was arrested by detective Boyd in St. Thomas on an information laid against him by the provincial police. The prisoner, it is alleged received the sum of $200.00 from Mrs. Jno McDonald of Southampton in return for which he was to secure the release of her son from the asylum Cole in some manner managed to have McDonald released but it was for but a short time, when he had to return to the institution and the police learning of the transaction between Mrs. McDonald and Cole, took steps to have him prosecuted, which resulted in his arrest in St. Thomas on Monday.

GRANTED $500.

At their meeting on Monday evening, the town council was addressed by Messrs. Jos. Morgan and N. Robertson, who spoke on behalf of the Red Cross Society, and solicited a contribution to that cause from the town. After some discussion the town fathers granted the sum of $300 to the Red Cross work this amount to be paid in three payments, of $100 to be made on the first day of February, March and April. A communication from Mr. H. M Lay, treasurer of the Patriotic Fund was also read. Mr. Lay pointed out that $60 per month was being drawn from this fund to support families in Walkerton and although part of the $700 already subscribed was still in the treasury, additional money would be urgently required before many months. The council made a grant of $200 to this work, $100 to be paid in May and $100 in June.

ADDITIONAL RECRUITS.

Since last week the following recruits have signed up for the third contingent:-

A R Dean	Walkerton
H Van Hatten	"
F Zettle	"
R McCarter	"
S L Honey	Southampton
David McLaren	"
E Habn	Hanover

CAFE SOLD

Mr. Reg. McCarter has sold the Savoy Cafe, which he recently opened, to "Scotty" Scales and "Pokey" Woodman. Reg. signed up and left with the local corp of the third contingent for Guelph on Monday.

NAMES TAKEN FROM LIST

Last week we referred to the despicable act of a former Walkertonian, now a resident of Brant, who, because he held a grievance against them, placed a local man and his wife on the Indian List. Inspector White in placing the couple on the List merely carried out the instructions of the authorities as he is compelled to do, but on learning the facts of the case, through the local papers and otherwise, and finding that the couple should never have had their names upon that sheet, he wrote to the Department and on Monday received instructions to withdraw the names in question. The perpetrator of this act is liable to an action for damages, but we understand that no proceedings will be instituted. Mr. White wishes to warn the public that the prohibitory law should not be used for the purpose which this man used it, and if any further cases of this nature are brought to his notice in the future, the guilty parties will be prosecuted.

DEFEATED IN CHESLEY.

Friday was a disastrous day for the local High School hockey team. They journeyed to Chesley and were defeated by a score of 10-5, but this was only the beginning of their tale of woe and hard luck. If any team was ever followed by a hoodoo it was the H. S. aggregation. In the drive to Chesley in the storm and intense cold, John Rowland in an attempt to keep warm left the rig and while running behind stepped in a hole and sprained his ankle so badly that he was unable to play the game and after returning home was confined to his bed for two days. Vic McKecknie was the next victim of the hoodoo. The match in the Chesley rink had hardly commenced when he was kicked on the foot by his check and received a gash which required two stitches. With these two players incapacitated and another one going about with a blue-green-black eye (the result of a collision on the ice) the high school team is sure in a sorry plight. The H. S. boys play the printers on Saturday and to them we would say "Cheer up boys, the worst is yet to come, and the hoodoo is still close upon your heels."

The corps of volunteers which will represent Bruce County in the third contingent are now encamped at Guelph. Prior to their leaving, the Walkerton boys were all presented with tobacco pouches and pipes on behalf of the town and the entire number of recruiting who gathered here were tendered a farewell banquet at the Armoury on Saturday evening. A very enjoyable evening was spent, by the volunteers and those who were fortunate enough to be present.

The boys left on the early G.T.R. train on Monday morning for the training camp at Guelph. They were accompanied to the depot by the local home guard and were given a rousing send-off by the several hundred people who had gathered there to bid them farewell. The soldiers will be stationed and trained at Guelph for some weeks and it is expected will be able to visit their homes here before leaving for England.

COUNTY COUNCIL.

The January Session of the 1915 Bruce County Council is in progress in the council chambers this week. The session opened on Tuesday afternoon with all members present.

The first business transacted was the selection of a Warden for the ensuing year and two names A. E. McNab of Walkerton and Alex McConnel of Saugeen, were placed before the meeting. On a vote being taken, Mr. McConnell was elected, the vote standing 20 to 12.

The standing committees for the year were then selected as follows:

FINANCE

Messrs Brown, McNab, Murdoch, Nesbitt, Forbes, Doering and Kastner

ROAD AND BRIDGE

Messrs Phelan, Jas. Hunter, Case, Filsinger, Whicher, Wilkinson, Willoughby, Kuntz and Johnston.

EQUALIZATION AND SALARIES

Messrs Izzard, Ballachey, Wm. Hunter, Sinclair, Walmsley, Mallough and D. A. McDonald.

PETITIONS AND BYLAWS

Messrs Scott, Craig, D. B. McDonald, Burns and Dobson.

EDUCATION AND PRINTING

Messrs Douglas, Grant, Munn, Murdoch, Burns, Doering and Kastner.

PROPERTY

Messrs Nesbitt, Kuntz, Ballachy Mallough and Izzard.

WARDENS

HOUSE OF REFUGE

Messrs McNab, Filsinger and the Warden.

TWENTY LOCAL MEN

The volunteers for the third Canadian overseas contingent who have been gathering here during the past two weeks left on Monday morning for the mobilization camp at Guelph. Bruce County was asked for 150 men for this contingent but only 61 have answered the call. Of this number twenty or about one-third were Walkerton young men. This is the largest number of local young men who have enrolled in any one of the three contingents and would indicate that the young men of Walkerton were awakening to the fact that their King and Country need them. If all other municipalities in the county had sent as large a representation as Walkerton the number would easily have been realized, but as it is, there is room for many more and recruiting for the third contingent is still in progress and any who wish to join should send in their names at once or apply personally at the armoury, Walkerton.

SENTENCED TO ONE YEAR.

John Lazure, alias John Langton appeared before Judge Klein on Saturday and on pleading guilty to two charges, that of horse-stealing and escaping from the custody of a constable was sent down for one year on both charges. It will be remembered that Lazure escaped from the custody of Constable Mills of Tara after being convicted of stealing a team of horses and other articles in December from his employer, Wm Trelford, of Arran Tp. He managed to make his escape by jumping out of the window of the train between Tara and Dobbington while enroute to Walkerton. Mills got a clue that his man was in Peterboro from letters which Lazure had addressed to his wife, he evidently supposing she was still residing at Mr. Trelford's. He always signed the letters in the name of his wife's brother but the scheme proved his undoing as the authorities soon caught on to his game and the postmark divulged his place of residence. He was rearrested in Peterboro and arrived here on Saturday. Lazure who claims to be but 24 years of age has a bad past record and it is claimed has served terms on several occasions, and at his trial, admitted that he had been an inmate of the Elmira N.Y. reformatory, having been found guilty of grand larceny. Considering the nature of the crimes the prisoner committed and his past record, the judge was decidedly lenient in imposing a sentence of one year's imprisonment.

AN ELOQUENT SERMON

On Sunday evening Rev. Thos. Wilson, pastor of Knox church, preached a special farewell sermon to the volunteers who had gathered here for the third contingent. A large congregation gathered to listen to Mr. Wilson's discourse which was of a very interesting and beneficial nature, not only to the volunteers who had joined the ranks, but to everyone in the edifice. The minister took as his text, II Timothy 2, 3: "Endure hardness like a good soldier." This text is taken from a letter from an old soldier to young recruit. The Apostle Paul had just about fought the good fight and finished his course, while Timothy was just beginning. Paul impresses upon the young soldier the fact that the life of a soldier was not one of ease but one of activity, not one of pleasure but of hardship, and that he (Timothy) is urged to endure hardness like a good soldier.

The speaker spoke of the hardship of a soldier:—

I The trial of leaving home and friends and country. Christ said to his diciples that anyone who is not ready to leave father and mother, wife and husband, etc., is not fit for his service as one of his followers. You, said the minister, are doing that. Some of you leaving dependent ones behind, leaving wife and children, parents and others. The work of the Patriotic Fund is to provide for all such and Mr. Wilson urged upon the audience to see that these dependent ones are provided for.

II The hardships of the battlefield. We have read of the trials being endured. The severity of the weather by rain and frost and living in trenches, etc. The Daughters of the Empire are doing much to relieve this suffering. Mr. Wilson praised the ladies for their work and said "there are many who shall look for the comforts you are sending."

III. The hardships which come through sickness and wounds on battlefield. No wonder that we read of much suffering there. The object of the Red Cross Society is to relieve this class. Hospitals are instituted on land and sea, this society is crying loud for help. The doctors and nurses are doing a noble work. We must give them aid.

IV The constant grind and drill is not easily borne. We promise you young men said the speaker that we will help you to bear the burden, yet war is war and every man must bear his own burden.

In closing Mr. Wilson spoke a closing message to the men, God has said "Call upon me and I will sustain you," remember that promise and put it to the test, endure hardness like a good soldier.

SWALLOWED TOOTHPICK.

Mr. Harry Smith, bartender at the Queen's Hotel, was the victim of a peculiar accident on Monday. After having dinner, Mr. Smith was going about with a toothpick in his mouth and while talking to a friend inadvertently allowed it to slip down his throat. Little was thought of the occurrence at the time, but in the evening he was taken seriously ill and suffered violent pains. A doctor was summoned and on learning the cause of Mr. Smith's condition, managed after a time to bring the troublesome pick from his patients stomach. Mr. Smith has now fully recovered from his unpleasant experience.

CURLING NOTES.

Two rinks of local curlers skipped by H. M. Lay and L. H. McNamara went to Harriston on Friday last to play for the Ontario Tankard, and were defeated in the primary games by Palmerston by 15 shots. They also played a friendly game with Wingham rinks and were again defeated by 17 shots.

On Tuesday evening a rink representing the town council played a friendly game with a rink comprised of members of the county council and succeeded in trimming them by a score of 12-10 The game was a close and interesting one and was keenly contested throughout. The rinks were as follows:-

Town	County
Johnson	Brown, Chesley
McNab	Izzard, Port Elgin
Lippert	Doering, Mildmay
Collins, sk. 12	Murdock, Lucknow sk 12

These rinks will probably play another game before the close of the County Council meeting

The president and vice president rinks have been chosen and the games in this competition will start this week. Mr. W. H. McBurney is the president while his opponent is A. E McNab.

Mildmay curlers are expected to play here on Thursday evening.

HOCKEY

The "Colts" have added another victory to their credit having defeated the (champions?) Mildmay stick-handlers at the rink here on Friday evening last by the one-sided score of 11-3 From the view-point of the average spectator the game was was not of the class which the fans expected and was not the hair-raising contest which was looked for.

At 8.25 referee "Cully" Hocker of Listowel, started the game and from the face-off the locals secured the rubber and in five seconds tallied their first counter. This was followed by others in rapid succession and before half time they had scored six, while during the entire period the Walkerton goal was never in danger, La France clearing the few long shots which he was called upon to stop.

The second half started to be a repetition of the first, the locals increasing the score to 8-0 after five minutes of play. At this point, however, Cook of the Mildmay team received a bad cut which compelled him to retire from the game, Vogan going off to even up. Playing the six-man game appeared more advantageous to the visitors than to the locals and the balance of the game was more even. This change was welcomed by the large crowd of spectators present as the scoring for Walkerton had become monotonous. Mildmay notched their first goal shortly afterwards while Harvey Oberle was decorating the boards for tripping, and this was followed by a second and third in rapid succession. The Walkerton sextette awakened from their lethargy at this point and during the remainder of the half scored three while the "Dutchmen" managed to add another one to their credit, making the score 11-4. The teams lined up:—

MILDMAY		WALKERTON
Schell	goal	La France
Berry	r defence	Vogan
Cooke	l "	Rife
Godfrey	rover	R. Oberle
Patton	centre	H. Oberle
Wendt	l wing	C. Oberle
Schell	r "	Runstadtler

It's a long way to Tipperary, but not far to Mildmay, and a good many are planning a visit to that town on February 5th when Walkerton plays the last game of the district schedule in that burg.

Southampton was defeated in Port Elgin on Friday by a score of 6-2.

Walkerton plays in Port Elgin on Friday of this week, and the return game will be played here on Tuesday of next week. These will be the deciding contests for the district championship.

The standing of the teams in the district now is:

	Won	Lost	To Play
Walkerton	3	0	3
Port Elgin	3	1	2
Southampton	1	3	2
Mildmay	0	3	3

TRUE TO HIS RACE

"It grieves me very much to see you here, Hurst, even for a few days. But it can only be for a few days, my friend, for the sessions are near at hand, when you will be tried and most certainly acquited. I hope you know this?"

"Are you a Christian, Benjamin?"

"Yes, my lord, however unworthy to bear that name."

"Then you must not be a fatalist. You will be acquitted, Benjamin. But I wish you to be more than acquitted. I wish you to be vindicated. I wish your character to come pure from this ordeal as fine gold from the fiery furnace. For this reason I have to-day retained for your defence the most learned lawyer and eloquent advocate in the country—I mean Mr. Percy Melliss, of whom, no doubt, you have heard."

"Oh, yes," said Benny, immediately recollecting the name of the young lawyer who, years before, had so successfully defended his, Benny's, foster-mother—"Oh, yes, my lord, I have heard of Mr. Melliss. But, oh, how, shall I ever be able to thank you enough for all your goodness and kindness to me?" enquired Benny, raising his sad eyes gratefully to the eyes of the earl.

"My poor boy, by letting me serve you as much as I wish to do," said the earl, caressing the thin, pale, fettered hand that he held between his own. "I like you, Benjamin. I wish to see you prosperous and happy. An when you shall be acquitted and vindicated, you must let me do a great deal for you, indeed. You must take a great deal from me. We can, any of us, take anything from one who loves us, can we not, Benjamin?"

The poor young man, overcome by this gentleness of sympathy, dropped his face upon his fettered hands, burst into tears, and sobbed. After a little while he composed himself, and said:

"Forgive this weakness, my lord, I have not been used to such kindness except from one."

"There, there; it is perfectly natural. You are not physically strong, and you have been severely tried. Now let us look beyond the dark present to the fair future, not so far off. When you are fully acquitted and vindicated, both by the court and the press, we must see to giving you a fresh start in. You are not fit for service, Benjamin. You must not go into it again. You must select some profession that will be more to your taste. You are quite young enough to study law or medicine; or, if you prefer it, as all England is arming now for the Crimean war, you might enter the army. It would give me the greatest happiness to purchase a commission for you in some good regiment, or to enter you at some law school or medical college."

"Too much; too much, my lord! You—you—" Benny began, but his voice was choked with emotion.

"Ah, Hurst, if you would but keep in mind that we are the sons of one Father, you would not then think or feel that I, the fortunate brother, could do too much for you, the unhappy one," said Lord Wellrose.

He spoke, of course, of the universal brotherhood, yet Benny's pale face flushed at the words.

"Benny," said the earl suddenly, yet with great gentleness, "do you remember the time when we first met?"

"In London, my lord?" inquired Benjamin.

"No, in Brighton."

"Oh, yes, my lord. I remember well the little gentleman who emptied his own pockets and levied contributions from the purses of his little sisters to buy shoes and stockings for the barefooted boy they met on the Esplanade. I remember, well, my lord. I remember, also, how a few days later, the little angels, as they seemed to me then, had me brought off from the dark, snowy sidewalk into their bright, warm parlor, and gave me a piece of their Twelfth-day cake. I remember all the incidents of that evening. Such bright spots in my dark life were too few to be forgotten. I remember, my lord. And the first time I saw you in London I recognized you at once. But it was not for me to speak."

"I very soon recognized you also, Hurst. And now remember, my boy, that this friendship of ours began in our boyhood. And trust me as an old friend," said the young earl with a smile. And then he gave place to the almost forgotten chaplain, who came and sat down by the young prisoner and talked with him for a few moments, and then proposed prayer, in which Lord Wellrose joined them.

When they arose from their knees the young earl, looking around upon the bare, comfortless cell, said:

"I see, Benjamin, that you require a good many articles here to make you decently comfortable. I will call on the governor and obtain leave to fit up this place for you. I will also send you some books to while away the tedious hours. Mr. Melliss, your counsel, will call this afternoon. I hope you will confide entirely in him. And another faithful young friend of yours will come to see you to-morrow. She bade me tell you so, with her love."

"Ah, my lord, how is she? I have been wishing to ask you all this time, but could not bear to breathe her name in a place like this. How is she?" earnestly inquired Benny.

"She is suffering from the shock she has received, of course. But she hopes to be well enough to come to see you to-morrow."

"Does she think me guilty of this murder?" inquired Benny, with quivering lips.

"No. She would stake her life upon your innocence. She will tell you so when she sees you to-morrow. Keep up your spirits, Benjamin," said the earl, in the cheerful, encouraging tone which he had maintained during the whole interview.

"Oh, I thank Heaven that she, at least, does not think me guilty!" said the young man earnestly.

"Very few people can believe you to be so, Benjamin," observed the earl.

"Does she suspect who did the deed?" inquired the young prisoner, hesitating anxiously.

"No; but she suspects that you know who did it, and will not tell even to clear yourself. She suspects that you are shielding the real murderer, even at the risk of your own life," said the young earl, gazing wistfully into the face of the prisoner, who started, turned white as death, and met the earl's gaze with a look so conscious, that in an instant, as by a flash of revelation, Lord Wellrose knew who it was that Benjamin Hurst was shielding—Suzy's brother, who had fled and left Benjamin Hurst to suffer for him—possibly even to die for him!

The conviction was so sudden and overwhelming that the young earl felt himself obliged to sit down again to recover from the shock.

And at the same moment the door was opened by the guard and Mr. Percy Melliss entered.

CHAPTER XXV.

And then, having promised to visit the prisoner again on the ensuing morning, he bade good-day to both, and, attended by the chaplain, left the cell.

He took leave of the reverend gentleman at the gate, entered his carriage, and directed his coachman to drive home. When he arrived at Cheviot House, he shut himself in his own apartments and gave his mind to painful reflections.

He felt convinced that Benjamin Hurst was shielding the real murderer with his life, and that the murderer was William Juniper!

And yet, when he came to review the evidence given before the coroner's jury, he could find nothing whatever to connect young Juniper with the crime, while there was very much to criminate young Hurst.

When Suzy had been arrested by Mr Stuart Fitzroy, it was not William Juniper, but Benjamin Hurst, who became fired with just anger.

When Stuart Fitzroy left the house in a state of intoxication that rendered him incapable of taking care of himself, it was not William Juniper, but Benjamin Hurst, who attended to him.

And finally, when the body of the murdered man was discovered within three minutes after the fatal deed, it was not William Juniper, but Benjamin Hurst, that was found standing over the corpse.

And yet in the very face of these facts the Earl of Wellrose felt convinced, not only of Benjamin Hurst's innocense, but also of William Juniper's guilt.

Under these circumstances, how should he proceed?

Should he denounce Suzy's brother to the proper authorities, and thus become the fatal agent in bringing him to trial, and perhaps to condemnation and death?

It was a horrible thought.

But even if he could bring himself to accuse William Juniper of the murder of Stuart Fitzroy, what evidence had he to put forward in support of his accusation?

None whatever, except his own firm moral conviction. And moral conviction, however firm, is not legal evidence.

But yet, believing and feeling as he did, should he leave poor Benjamin Hurst to suffer for William Juniper, the innocent for the guilty?

He dressed and went down to the drawing-room, where he found his mother and sisters, the still beautiful duchess and her fair daughters.

They were discussing some matter of very distressing interest, for even their fair, calm faces bore signs of much disturbance.

Lord Wellrose thought his mother was referring to the recent murder in Piccadilly, and as she had not addressed herself to him, he did not feel called upon to make any comment. The next words undeceived him.

"How many did you say were uninjured, mamma?" inquired Lady Hester.

"There were thirteen unfortunates killed outright, my love, and thirty-nine dangerously wounded," answered the duchess.

"Oh, a shocking accident, my dear, on the Paris & Marseilles Railroad! A collision between the express and a freight train, in which a number of lives have been lost or endangered," answered the duchess, with a shudder.

"Shocking, indeed! Why, I had not heard of it!" said the earl.

"The news came by telegraph to the evening papers. There are but few particulars given. But I suppose we shall see all about it in to-morrow morning's papers," replied the duchess.

And at that moment the sliding doors were run back and the groom of the chambers appeared, and said:

"Her grace is served."

"My father does not dine at home to-day?" inquired the earl, as he gave his mother his arm to lead her in to dinner.

"No, he is at Windsor. There is a Cabinet council," answered the duchess, and the subject was dropped.

The next morning the young earl called by appointment at Park Lane to escort Suzy on her distressing visit to poor Benjamin Hurst.

On reaching the house, he was shown at once into the rose parlor, where he found Suzy with her bonnet on, waiting for him. The poor girl had changed, even within the last twenty-four hours. She was fearfully pale and wasted, though her manner was more composed than it had been on the preceding day.

"Oh, Lord Wellrose, you did not quiet me with false hopes yesterday, did you? You would not have given me false hopes even for that purpose, would you?" she inquired, in a beseeching voice.

"Indeed I would not, my dearest one!" he answered, earnestly.

"Indeed, no. He is nearly sure to be acquitted."

"Nearly sure!" sighed Suzy. "Oh, Lord Wellrose how awful to think that there should be the remotest chance of his conviction!" she cried, wringing her hands.

"Believe me, I do not think that there is. The evidence is not sufficient to convict him; and, besides, we have retained Mr. Percy Melliss, the greatest criminal lawyer in Europe, for his defence."

"Oh, a hundred thousand thanks for all your goodness," began Suzy, but the earl gently stopped her by inquiring if they could set out for their visit then.

She readily assented, and he led her to the carriage that stood waiting at the door.

"And, oh, Lord Wellrose, I wish to speak to you about another matter. You must know that my brother left us four days ago to proceed to Paris on my affairs."

"I understood so; yes," replied the earl, wondering.

"He was to see the manager of the Theatre Francais by appointment, and make arrangements for my engagement there."

"Yes," said the earl, seeing that Suzy paused.

"Well, he should have been there the evening of the same day upon which he left here."

"Certainly."

"And now the queerest part of the business is that he did not get there at all!"

"No!" exclaimed the earl, all the more interested because of the suspicion that had entered his mind, connecting Suzy's missing brother with the murder of Stuart Fitzroy.

"No, indeed. And while I have been waiting here, expecting every hour either to see or hear from my brother, this morning comes a telegram from the manager of the Theatre Francais, inquiring what has delayed my agent, that he does not come to treat with him according to agreement. Now, what do you think of that, Lord Wellrose?"

"So he may, but then he would have written, or he would have got some one else to write," said Suzy. "And oh, Lord Wellrose, there has been a most awful railway accident in France!" she added, growing paler.

"I know it, my love; a very horrible catastrophe indeed, profoundly to be deplored. But it does not concern your brother in the least."

"Ah, I don't know. He may have been one of the victims."

"But, my dearest, your brother was travelling, if I understand you, from Dover to Paris. And this accident happened between Paris and Marseilles."

"Yes, I know; I thought of that; but, still ——" She paused and sighed.

"Still I fear I know not what or why. Perhaps I am 'a woman naturally born to fears,' as poor Constance says. And where there is doubt or danger, I fear the worst, rationally or irrationally."

As she spoke the carriage drew up before the gloomy walls of Newgate.

Upon the earl's application they were at once admitted within the building, and conducted first to the chaplain's room.

This venerable man received the young earl with grave respect. And when the latter presented Suzy, he shook her hands with much kindness of manner.

At the earl's request, he willingly consented to accompany them to the cell of the prisoner Hurst.

He rang for the proper person to attend the party, and then immediately went thither.

"We interrupt you," said the chaplain, who preceded the party into the cell.

He shook hands with his client, bade him keep up his spirits, and then came out of the cell and bowed to the earl and the lady and hurried away.

"That is Percy Melliss, the great criminal advocate. I should have presented him to you had he not hurried away so fast," said the earl, as they, in their turn, entered the cell.

The care of the earl had already improved its appearance.

The stone floor was covered with a thick carpet, two comfortable chairs, and a small stand covered with books stood against the wall, and clean bedding and white draperies covered the bunk.

"I owe you my thanks, Lord Wellrose, for the many comforts you have so kindly sent me. The upholsterer was here as soon as the doors were opened this morning to fit up my cell. I thank your lordship very much indeed!" said Benjamin earnestly as he arose to welcome the earl.

"There, there! I have done nothing worth mentioning, my good fellow. But here is a friend come to see you," said the earl, as he handed Suzy into the cell.

"Oh, my dear Benny!" exclaimed Suzy, in a low voice, as she held out both hands to the young prisoner and burst into tears.

"Don't cry. Indeed, it is not so very bitter to be here, when friends are so kind," said Benny, earnestly.

"Ah! poor brother! You have had so little kindness and sympathy in your life that you reconcile yourself even to a prison when it brings friends around you," wept Suzy.

"And who would not? 'Love is the greatest good in the world.' And I did not know that any loved me until I got into this trouble," said the young man, smiling pleasantly.

"Oh, Benny!" sighed Suzy. Then changing her tone as she sat down beside him, she said: "Benny, you are doing now exactly what you did fifteen years ago. You are innocently suffering for the guilt of another. You are shielding with your own person the real criminal! Oh, Benny! if not for your own sake, for my sake, clear yourself by giving him up to justice. Yes, even if he were my own brother, I should still implore you not to sacrifice yourself for him, but to clear your own innocent name and fame by giving him up to justice," said Suzy, utterly unsuspicious that it was her own brother for whom the poor young man was offering himself up.

"Dear Suzy," said the prisoner, "if you really care for me, speak no more of this. I cannot stir from the ground I have taken."

"Then you admit that you are shielding someone?" enquired the weeping girl.

"No, I do not admit anything of the sort," said Benny gently. "But listen, Suzy. I am in no sort of danger of conviction. My counsel assures me that the prosecution has no case to go upon at all—that I shall be certainly acquitted by the jury."

"Oh, Benny, yes! but will you be acquitted by public opinion? Will not you still suffer and continue to suffer for the guilt of another?"

"Suzy, even if your theory were correct, which I do not admit, still, would it not be better that I should suffer some suspicions than that another, more unfortunate than guilty, should suffer the extreme penalty of the law; and all connected with him should be plunged in unmerited shame and sorrow?"

Danger Signals Warn You of Approaching Paralysis

You may be restless, nervous, irritable and sleepless, but you think there is nothing to be alarmed at. You have no appetite, digestion is impaired, and there is weakness and irregularity of other bodily organs. You feel tired in body and mind, and find that you lack the energy to attend to the daily task.

You may not realize that these are the symptoms of nervous prostration and the danger signals which warn you that some form of paralysis is the next step of development.

Dr. Chase's Nerve Food is the most successful restorative for the nerves that has ever been offered to the public. This has been proven in many thousands of cases similar to the one described in this letter.

MRS. ALLAN.

Mrs. Thos. Allan, R.F.D., 3, Sombra, Ont., writes:—"Five years ago I suffered a complete breakdown, and frequently had palpitation of the heart. Since that illness I have had dizzy spells, had no power over my limbs (locomotor ataxia) and could not walk straight. At night I would have severe nervous spells, with heart palpitation, and would shake as though I had the ague. I felt improvement after using the first box of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food, and after continuing the treatment can now walk, eat and sleep well, have no nervous spells and do not require heart medicine. I have told several of my neighbors of the splendid results obtained from the use of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food."

OUR NAVAL LOSSES.

(Toronto Star)

The great battle squadron that forms the striking force of Britain stands intact after five months, as ready to throw its preponderant forces upon the German navy as it was on the day the war began. The strategy of the enemy has not succeeded, and his losses have actually been greater than ours, while his ability to sustain them has been much less. Britain's vessels have been in the open everywhere, exposed to submarine attacks and mine dangers, while German cruisers have kept pretty much in seclusion. But it is Britain's secondary fleet that has been taking all these risks. Past this outer defence the enemy has been unable to reach.

This is what it means when we read in a despatch that "the vessel lost was an old one of an obsolete type." It means that while the loss injures us it does not benefit the enemy—does not affect that fighting fleet set apart from the first day of the war to smash German seapower and waiting ever since always ready for the grand clash.

He Wants All The World to Know It

DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS CURED JEAN BAPTISTE TAPP.

Quebec Man Who Suffered From Kidney Disease for Many Years is Again a Robust, Healthy Man.

L'Anse-a-Valleau, Gaspe Co., Que., Jan. 24.—(Special)—"I am happy to tell you Dodd's Kidney Pills made me well." So says Jean Baptiste Tapp, a well known and highly respected resident of this place. And so thankful is Mr. Tapp for the benefits he has received from Dodd's Kidney Pills that he wants the whole world to know it. He wants others who suffer as he did to know the cure.

"For many years I suffered from kidney disease," Mr. Tapp says. "It started from a cold, and gradually grew worse. My skin had a harsh, dry feeling, my appetite was fitful, and I perspired freely with the slightest exertion. I had flashes of light before my eyes, and I was always tired and nervous.

"Finally rheumatism was added to my troubles, while attacks of sciatica and neuralgia followed. The doctor who attended me and the medicines I tried, failed to help me till I decided to use Dodd's Kidney Pills. I took four boxes in all, and to-day I am a robust man in excellent health."

RELIGION WAXES IN WAR.

EFFACING TIME.

(Des Moines Register and Leader)

Rather a striking quotation from the late John Muir was made at the burial of this author and naturalist who died in California the day before Christmas. "Longest is the life that contains the largest amount of time-effacing enjoyment," of which was made by John Muir and quoted by his friend.

It suggests a point of view that with all our strenuous interest in life we are likely to miss. Time need not worry us when we are absorbed with the joy which makes us forget time. We become unmindful either of its dragging or of its flying when we concern ourselves with work that is a steady delight. Every new year, while it lasts, ought to be just as good as eternity for us. We can only live in the present anyway.

But we have formed a habit of looking ahead and anticipating the end of our day or our week or our year, and of looking back and regretting the beginning. And we lose a good deal of the passing moments in this rather futile occupation. So far as we know it might turn out that time is only an illusion anyhow, invented by mortals who are sighing for eternity. The wisest course seems to be to grasp the little section of existence before us that the philosopher have such difficulty in defining and live it to the best of our ability for "steady delight." This would really end a lot of our dismay about the flight and passing of time.

PRACTICAL ROMANCE.

(New York Sun)

"Show the $50,000" is reported to have been the first thing a "correspondence" bride said on meeting the bridegroom at Grafton, W. Va. He showed the money, so they were married. It would be interesting to watch the future fortunes of this pair. According to sentimental standards it was not a good beginning, but perhaps the sound sense of realities that the lady displayed may augur better for marital peace and prosperity than a whole lot of flimsy declarations of unselfish devotion. Love at first sight backed by a sufficient to meet the demand of the butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker is apt to wear much better than the impulse which has mere empty hope behind it. Romance with a greenback for every page has a good chance of keeping up its interest to the last chapter.

THE CALL.

By a Canadian Soldier.

(From the London Daily Mirror.)

I hear the clear note of the bugle
And the roar of the calling drum,
And I feel the swing of the marching men,
And a deep, deep voice says, Come.
For the arrow of duty points forward,
Though the heartstrings quiver and break,
Yet the voice of my calling country
Is one I may not forsake.
For my manhood heeds and listens
And bends an attentive ear,
And though war's alarm may bring me harm,
My road lies plain and clear.
It stretches wide from my own fireside,
At the far end stands the foe;
And though grim death meets my eager breath,
I am ready and glad to go.
For England asks for the sons she lent
To the East, West, South and North,
And who stands by when a mother's cry
Is bidding her sons "Stand Forth"?
The shades of the past stand clear at last
For the flag by land and sea:
What was duty for Wellington, Nelson and Moore
Is doubly duty for me.
For they handed down the hard-won crown
That is made for the victor's brow,
And the glory of deeds afloat and ashore
Is one to remember now.
Then God send England the strong right arm,
To prosper well in the fight,
And show that the sea-girt island
Is backed by the Empire's might.

Spanking does not cure children of bed-wetting. There is a constitutional cause for this trouble. Mrs. M. Don't blame the child, the chances are it can't help it. This treatment also cures adults and aged people troubled with urine difficulties by day or night.

MILITARY TRAINING.

(Montreal Evening News)

From the educational standpoint military training means physical precision, vigor and alertness, mental control and spirit of independence, benignly combined with sense of discipline. Such training will make men more efficient in peace as well as in war.

But a "soldier nation" is a thing apart. It inevitably results in aggressive militarism the spirit of conquest or domination, which is so inconsistent with the world's progress. The defence idea and the German spirit of conquest are poles apart. An argument for the former is a condemnation of the latter.

FOR RAIL SAFETY

(Philadelphia Record)

On the Long Island Railroad experiments that seem to be entirely convincing have been made with a device that will automatically prevent an engine from entering a block on which there is another train. This would prevent all collisions, whether head-on or rear-end. At the end of each block is a piece of third rail with which the locomotive makes electric connection. If the block is clear the current that passes through the locomotive is not strong enough to cause any result, but if there is a train on the block the current is short-circuited, blowing the whistle, shutting off steam and setting the brakes.

IF POSITIONS WERE REVERSED.

(Detroit Free Press)

While the British foreign minister is conciliatory and friendly, he does not give away his case, and he makes it plain that the limit of possible concession is to be the point where concession will begin materially to prejudice the interests of his own country. In short, he intimates that his government is willing to do anything within reason to please and placate America, but that justice to itself and its cause must stand first and be of paramount importance. Which, we take it, is about the stand the American people who wish its own foreign minister to take, were the positions of the two countries reversed.

GIANT PLANES.

Those of Russian Armies Will Carry Twenty Men.

A great deal has been heard concerning the British and German aeroplanes, but the great Sikorsky biplanes used by the troops of the Czar have been overlooked.

These machines, invented by a famous Russian named Sikorsky, are by far the biggest aeroplanes being flown in the war—in fact, they are the largest in the world. They stand 16 feet high, and are about 100 feet wide.

The Sikorsky can carry almost as many passengers as a Zeppelin airship. Twenty men can be accommodated in the large passenger cabin, which is constructed of metal and contains numerous windows. In this machine three engines are fitted, which give a total of nearly 1,000 horsepower, for, owing to the Sikorsky biplane weighing in itself one and a half tons, and having as large a crew to carry, demands high power to pull it off the ground and keep it in the air.

The weight of the machine has necessitated an elaborate landing-chassis composed of numerous springs and pneumatic tubes, so that the huge biplane can alight safely on rough ground at a speed of sixty miles an hour.

THE REASON.

HEALTH WRECKED THROUGH LA GRIPPE

It Generally Leaves the Patient Debilitated and an Easy Victim to Other Diseases.

One of the foremost medical writers says: "It is astonishing the number of people who have been crippled in health for years after an attack of la grippe or influenza." The real danger from this disease, which sweeps over Canada every winter, is during convalescence, when the characteristic symptoms, the fever, the catarrh, the headache and the depression of spirits pass away. Grip leaves behind it weakened vital powers, thin blood, impaired digestion and over-sensitive nerves—a condition that makes the system an easy prey to pneumonia, bronchitis, rheumatism, nervous prostration and even consumption. It is a condition that calls most emphatically for a tonic for the blood. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are a tonic especially adapted to meet this need, as they purify and enrich the blood. They tone up the nerves and give vigor, strength and health to the debilitated system. Mrs. Howard D. Chaffey, Indian Island, N. B., says: "For several winters in succession I was attacked by la grippe, which left me weak and badly run down. In each case I used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills with the most beneficial results. Last winter when the trouble was again prevalent I took the precaution of fortifying my system with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and escaped the trouble, while many of my neighbors were down with it. In fact, I enjoyed the best of health all spring and feel sure this medicine will so fortify the system as to prevent the trouble."

These Pills are sold by all medicine dealers or may be had by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE BRITISH NOTE.

(Chicago Tribune)

The British may not have got the facts both accurately, but, if they have, it must be conceded here that their nation exigency demands the fullest use of protective measures. Great Britain has taxed itself for generations to obtain such control of the sea as would enable it to adopt such military measures as might be needed in war. Germany has taxed itself for generations to provide an army which would carry the war into the other nation's territory. Each has succeeded in its programme.

Battles are fought almost everywhere except in German territory. Ports are closed except as the British permit them to be open. The United States cannot expect Great Britain to give up its advantage unless a case from [illegible] and deceits can be established by this nation. If we insist on contraband trade we may as well expect that there will be interference with other trade.

The Stalwart Youth in civil garb was strolling down the Strand,
When the Dear Old Busybody buttonholed him out of hand.
"For shame, my fine young sir," she said, "to waste your hours in play!
Are you idle when your King and country call you to the fray?"
"Yus, I'm aht o' work just nah," said he, a twinkle in his eye;
And the Dear Old Busybody heaved a sad, reproachful sigh.
"Oh, come, my dear young man, and let me drive you straight," she said,
"To the next Recruiting Station!" but he grinned and shook his head.
"Then do let me persuade you," she implored in accents wild,
"Just to join the Territorials!" Again the stranger smiled.
"Now, I cawn't just nah, me lidy, for to tell the 'ole truth I've a gammy arm that ain't well yet," returned the Stalwart Youth.
"Where did you get that hurt?" she asked. He answered her again:
"Why, I got it in the firin' line upon the bloomin' Aisne!"

THE ZEPPELIN.

(Pittsburg Gazette-Times)

The experts who have been writing and speaking so freely about the war ever since it began have not been vindicated by all the developments, but their opinion of the zeppelin as a military factor still holds good. It is that the big dirigible is a disappointment. To date the Zeppelin's only achievements have been the dropping of a few bombs on undefended cities, the demolishing of some houses and the killing of a score or so of non-combatants. When there was real work to be done, such as the reduction of a fortress, the Zeppelin was conspicuous by its absence.

Even assuming that the allies are to lose, what has Ireland to expect from the conqueror? True, Germany has given gracious and unctuous assurance that she will not invade Ireland to stay or to rule, but thoughtful Irishmen must realize that the day of small nations is past. If Belgium could not maintain herself, how could Ireland, even with as substantial guarantees as Belgium had? If Germany is to rule Europe, she might maintain Ireland as a check on England, but there would be eternal friction between the neighbors and no peace or prosperity for the lesser one.

HEROISM IS WORLD-WIDE.

(Montreal Evening News)

It is not peculiarly British to be heroic. Men of all nations in the great war are fighting valiantly and dying game. Every nation, every race has its roll of honor. But certainly the British, in every generation, have shown themselves equal to any test. The "Birkenhead Drill" stands forever in world records as one of many fine examples of coolness in the face of death.

But other memorable episodes might be cited, among them that of the American jackies who, in that fatal hurricane in Apia harbor, their own vessels doomed, lined the rails to cheer their British comrades fighting their way out in the face of the storm.

WHERE NEUTRALS FAILED.

In an illuminating article on the British navy and its work Mr. Archibald Hurd, the great English naval authority and expert, tells why the British coast towns were not fortified against attack from the sea. There is no mystery about the position of the seaside resorts. "But why," it may be asked, "did not one tell the nation that in case of war places like Scarborough, Whitby, Cromer and a score and more of other towns, such as Brighton and Eastbourne, might be bombarded; surely they ought to have had fortifications, since the navy can give no absolute guarantee of safety?" What is the answer? He gives it by saying that before the present war such towns could not be bombarded; all the nations, great and small, had met together and decided that any navy which committed such an act would outrage the law of humanity, and, inferentially, make all humanity its enemy. There seems to have been some idea that any power which misbehaved itself would be punished by the other countries whose signatures had been put to the agreement. But they were learning many things in these days, and among them is the fact that, so far as belligerents like Germany are concerned, Hague conventions are of no validity; they are brushed aside by "necessity." Nor is this all. They were learning that Germany can commit such acts without suffering reprisals from her partners, for all the neutral nations were involved in the act of framing the convention against the bombardment of 'open towns.' They have all been outraged; Britain has had to mourn the dead and maimed, but they equally with her have suffered in one respect—this law has gone.

Mr. Hurd further says that:

The nations of the world now know that their health resorts are no longer immune if war comes their way. One would imagine that this would be a disconcerting business for the Americans, the Italians, and all the other neutral countries, before whose eyes Germany has dishonored her signature. What have they done? Nothing. So far as is known, not one of the great powers has uttered a word of protest. What is the value of a Hague convention in these circumstances? Nothing. A mere "scrap of paper."

If the law of nations is not restored, every watering place in the world—British, Irish, American, Italian, Norwegian, Swedish, Spanish—every place by the sea where people go for rest and quiet must be fortified, and fortified so that it may be able to defend itself against the guns of dreadnoughts.

The Hague conventions are apparently mere "scraps of paper," so far as the neutral nations are concerned. They either consider it no concern of theirs or are afraid to give voice to their opinions. Why should the United States, for instance, remain silent, while these conventions are being broken? Why not protest against the invasion of Belgium? The Times believes that President Wilson is anxious to do what is right so long as he does not get his country into trouble. We appreciate the situation he finds himself in. But there are certain duties and obligations which neutrals cannot very well shirk, and although we do not like the ground Mr. Roosevelt takes and demand that the States actually intervene, we think that the President should at least protest in the name of the United States against the actions of Germany in this war.

But the back is not to blame.

Therefore, dull pain in the back, or sharp, quick twinges, are warnings of sick kidneys—warnings of kidney trouble.

Plasters and liniments will not cure a bad back, for they cannot reach the kidneys which cause it.

Doan's Kidney Pills reach the kidneys themselves. They are a special kidney and bladder medicine. They heal the diseased surface of kidneys and bladder, and help them to act freely and naturally.

Mrs. Chester Romain, Port Coulonge, Que., writes: "I had been troubled with sore back for over four years, and could get nothing to do me any good until I heard of your Doan's Kidney Pills. I got three boxes, and took them and now I am completely cured."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c a box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

In an address at New Rochelle, N. Y., recently, the veteran Dr. Dernburg said that

It is a struggle between Germany and England. We Germans love the French and the Belgians, who were forced into the war. We would have respected Belgian neutrality if England had promised to remain neutral, but she would not promise. Two days before war was declared England gave written assurance to France that she would stand by her.

If the doctor loves the French and Belgians, why invade and devastate their countries? Why bring horror upon horror upon the Belgians and take possession of their country?

N. Y. State Comptroller Travis has started an investigation of the Workmen's Compensation Commission. The Comptroller suspects that the appropriation of approximately $1,225,000 asked by the commission to meet expense during 1915 is excessive. It is said that an army of deputies, inspectors, etc., was maintained on the commission's payroll last summer and throughout the campaign for the re-election of Governor Glynn. Although the law provided that the principal office of the commission be located at Albany, it was maintained in New York City. Democratic politicians in New York and up-state who could not be taken care of in the Labor Department were in large numbers given jobs under the compensation commission. No chance of such things happening on our Commission, we make bold to say.

Canada's peat bogs are a valuable asset, says the Journal of the Canadian Peat Society. Sulphate of ammonia, a product of the peat plant, is a valuable fertilizer, for which there is a lucrative market in both Europe and here. Many Canadian peat bogs are rich in nitrogen, and therefore suitable for this industry, and enquiries have already been made by British capitalists with a view to establishing chemical works in Canada, provided that a sufficient supply of peat can be guaranteed. Apart from the potential value of our peat bogs as a subsidiary source of fuel supply and for production of sulphate of ammonia, there are numerous other products, such as moss litter, peat dust, alcohol, acetic acid, acetone, tar, tar oils, creosote, etc., which might form the basis of paying industries giving employment to many people, where now we have only waste lands.

The Kingston Standard complains that the Dominion Government has done nothing so far to carry out the recommendations of the recent Penitentiary Investigating Commission. It declares that sick men in the prison hospital are treated more like animals than like human beings. The stone pile—"that infamous place of refined torture, where men are not only breaking stone, but are breaking their hearts as well," is still in existence. The "brutal" rule, limiting the correspondence of the prisoners to one letter every two months is still applied. The Standard declares that "there is no better time than now, at the beginning of the new year, to put these much needed and humane reforms into effect. Every day's delay would seem to be as unnecessary as it is cruel." The Minister of Justice needs to be wakened up.

If You Wish to Be Well You Must Keep the Bowels Regular.

If the bowels do not move regularly they will, sooner or later, become constipated, and constipation is productive of more ill health than almost any other trouble.

The sole cause of constipation is an inactive liver, and unless the liver is kept active you may rest assured that headaches, jaundice, heartburn, piles, floating specks before the eyes, a feeling as if you were going to faint, or catarrh of the stomach will follow the wrong action of this, one of the most important organs of the body.

Keep the liver active and working properly by the use of Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills.

Mrs. Elijah A. Ayer, Fawcett Hill, N.B., writes: "I was troubled with constipation for many years, and about three years ago my husband wanted me to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, as they had cured him. I got a vial and took them, and by the time I had taken three vials I was cured. I always keep them on hand, and when I need a mild laxative I take one."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

A Public Idol

"Yes, yes!" she said, almost fiercely, stopping in the path. "It's that, I know. I have felt it almost since your first word. What power have I, if not tragic power? If a part like Elvira does not suit me, what does suit me? Of course, that is what you mean. If I cannot act Elvira, I am good for nothing—I am worse than good for nothing—I am an impostor, a sham!"

She sat down on the raised edge of the bank, for she was trembling, and clasped her quivering hands on her knees. Kendal was beside himself with distress. How had he blundered so, and what had brought this about? It was so unexpected, it was incredible.

"Do—do believe me!" he exclaimed, bending over her. "I never meant anything the least disrespectful to you. I never dreamed of it. You asked me to give you my true opinion and my criticism applied much more to the play than to yourself. Think nothing of it, if you yourself are persuaded. You must know much better than I can what will suit you. And as for Wallace—Wallace will be proud to let you do what you will with his play."

It seemed to him that he would have said anything in the world to soothe her, it was so piteous, so intolerable to him to watch that quivering lip.

"Ah, yes," she said, looking up, a dreary smile flitting over her face. "I know you didn't mean to wound me; but it was there, your feeling; I saw it at once. I might have seen it, if I hadn't been a fool, in Mr. Wallace's manner. I did see it. It's only what every one whose opinion is worth having is beginning to say. My acting has been a nightmare to me lately. I believe it has all been a great great mistake."

Kendal never felt a keener hatred of the conventions which rule the relations between men and women. Could he only simply have expressed his own feeling, he would have knelt beside her on the path, have taken the trembling hands in his own, and comforted her as a woman would have done. But as it was, he could only stand stiff and awkward before her, and yet it seemed to him as if the whole world had resolved itself into his own individuality and hers, and as if the gay river party and the bright friendly relations of an hour before were separated from the present by an impassable gulf. And, worst of all, there seemed to be a strange perversity in his speech—a fate which drove him into betraying every here and there his own real standpoint whether he would or no.

"You must not say such things," he said as calmly as he could. "You have charmed the English public as no one else has ever charmed it. Is not that a great thing to have done? And if I, who am very fastidious and very captious, and over-critical in a hundred ways—if I am inclined to think that a part is rather more than you, with your short dramatic experience, can compass quite successfully, why, what does it matter? I may be quite wrong. Don't take any notice of my opinion; forget it, and let me help you, if I can, by talking over the play."

She shook her head with a bitter little smile. "No, no; I shall never forget it. Your attitude only brought home to me, almost more strongly than I could bear, what I have suspected a long, long time—the contempt which people like you and Mr. Wallace feel for me!"

"Contempt!" cried Kendal, beside himself, and feeling as if all the criticisms he had allowed himself to make of her were recoiling in one avenging mass upon his head. "I never felt anything but the warmest admiration for your courage, your work, your womanly goodness and sweetness."

"Yes," she said, rising and holding out her hand half-unconsciously for her cloak, which she put round her as though the wood had suddenly grown cold; "admiration for me as a woman, contempt for me as an artist! There's the whole bare truth. Does it hold my future in it, I wonder? Is there nothing in me but this beauty that people talk of, and which I sometimes hate?"

She swept her hair back from her forehead with a fierce dramatic gesture. It was as though the self in her was rising up and asserting itself against the judgment which had been passed upon it, as if some hidden force hardly suspected even by herself were beating against its bars. Kendal watched her in helpless silence. "Tell me," she said, fixing her deep hazel eyes upon him, "you owe it me—you have given me so much pain. No, no; you did not mean it. But tell me, and tell me from the bottom of your heart—that is, if you are interested enough in me—what is it I want? What is it that seems to be threatening me with failure as an artist? I work all day long, my work is never out of my head; it seems to pursue me all night. But the more I struggle with it the less successful I seem even to myself."

Her look was haunting; there was despair and there was hope in it. It implied that she had set him up in her impulsive way as a sort of oracle who alone could help her out of her difficulty. In presence of that look his own conventionality fell away from him, and he spoke the plain, direct truth to her.

"What you want," he said slowly, as if the words were forced from him, "is knowledge! London has taught you much, and that is why you are dissatisfied with your work—it is the beginning of all real success. But you want positive knowledge—knowledge you could get from books, and the knowledge other people could teach you. You want a true sense of what has been done and what can be done with your art, and you want an insight into the world of ideas lying round it and about it. You are very young, and you have had to train yourself. But every human art nowadays is so complicated that none of us can get on without using the great stores of experience others have laid up for us."

It was all out now. He had spoken his inmost mind. They had stopped again, and she was looking at him intently; it struck him that he could not possibly have said what he had been saying unless he had been led on by an instinctive dependence upon a great magnanimity of nature in her. And then the next moment the strange opposites the matter held in it flashed across him. He saw the crowded theatre, the white figure on the stage, his ear seemed to be full of the clamor of praise with which London had been overwhelming its favorite. It was to this spoiled child of fortune that he had been playing the schoolmaster, he, one captious man of letters, against the world.

But she had not thought of the kind, or rather, the situation presented itself to her in exactly the contrary light. To her Kendal's words, instead of being those of a single critic, were the voice and the embodiment of a hundred converging impressions and sensations, and she felt a relief in having galvanized to the full the vague trouble which had been settling upon her by this unraveling of her own feelings and his.

"I am very grateful to you," she said, steadily; "very. It is strange, but almost when I first saw you I felt that there was something ominous in you to me. My dream, in which I have been living, has never been so perfect since, and now I think it has gone. Don't look so grieved," she cried, inexpressibly touched by his face. "I am glad you told me all you thought. It will be a help to me. And as for poor Elvira," she added, trying to smile for all her extreme paleness, "tell Mr. Wallace I give her up. I am not vexed, I am not angry. Don't you think now we had better go back to Mrs. Stuart? I should like a rest with her before we all meet again."

She moved forward as she spoke, and it seemed to Kendal that her step was unsteady and that she was deadly white. He planted himself before her in the descending path, and held out a hand to her to help her. She gave him her own, and he carried it impetuously to his lips.

"You are nobleness itself!" he cried, from the depths of his heart. "I feel as if I had been the merest pedant blunderer—the most incapable, clumsy idiot."

She smiled, but she could not answer. And in a few more moments voices and steps could be heard approaching and the scene was over.

CHAPTER VI.

The Sunday party separated at Paddington on the night of the Suneham expedition, and Wallace and Eustace Kendal walked eastward together. The journey home had been very quiet. Miss Bretherton had been forced to declare herself "extremely tired," and Mrs. Stuart's anxiety and sense of responsibility about her had communicated themselves to the rest of the party.

"It is the effect of my long day yesterday," she said apologetically to Forbes, who hovered about her with those affectionate attentions which a man on the verge of old age pays with freedom to a young girl. "It won't do to let the public see so much of me in future. But I don't want to spoil our Sunday. Talk to me, and I shall forget it."

Wallace, who had had his eyes about him when she and Eustace Kendal emerged from the wood in view of the rest of the party, was restless and ill at ease, but there was no getting any information, even by gesture, from Kendal, who sat in his corner diligently watching the moonlight on the flying fields, or making every now and then some disjointed attempts at conversation with Mrs. Stuart.

At the station Mrs. Bretherton's carriage was waiting, the party of gentlemen saw her and Mrs. Stuart, who insisted on taking her home, into it, the pale, smiling face bent forward, she waved her hand in response to the lifted hats, and she was gone.

"Well?" said Wallace, with a world of inquiry in his voice, as he and Kendal turned eastward.

"It has been an unfortunate business," said Kendal abruptly. "I never did a thing worse, I think, or spent a more painful half hour."

Wallace's face fell. "I wish I had not bored you with my confounded affairs," he exclaimed. "It was too bad!"

Kendal was inclined to agree inwardly, for he was in a state of irritable reaction; but he had the justice to add aloud. "It was I who was the fool to undertake it. And I think, indeed, it could have been done, but that circumstances which neither you nor I had weighed sufficiently, were against it. She is in a nervous, shaken state, mentally and physically, and before I had had time to discuss the point at all she had carried it on to the personal ground, and the thing was up."

"She is deeply offended, then?"

"Not at all, in the ordinary sense; she is too fine a creature; but she talked of the 'contempt' that you and I feel for her!"

"Good heavens!" cried Wallace, feeling most unjustly persuaded that his friend had bungled the matter horribly.

"Yes," said Kendal, deliberately; "'contempt,' that was it. I don't know how it came about. All I know is, that what I said, which seemed to me very harmless, was like a match to a mine. But she told me to tell you that she made no further claim on 'Elvira.' So the play is safe."

"D—the play!" cried Wallace, vigorously, a sentiment to which perhaps Kendal's silence gave consent. "But I cannot let it rest there. I must write to her."

"I don't think I would, if I were you," said Kendal. "I should let it alone. She looks upon the matter as finished. She told me particularly to tell you that she was not vexed, and you may be quite sure that she isn't, in any vulgar sense. Perhaps that makes it all the worse. However, you have a right to know what happened, so I'll tell you as far as I remember."

He gave an abridged account of the conversation, which made matters a little clearer, though by no means less uncomfortable, to Wallace. When it was over, they were nearing Vigo street, the point at which their routes diverged, Wallace having rooms in the Albany, and Kendal hailed a hansom.

"If I were you," he said, as it came up, "I should, as I said before, let the thing alone as much as possible. She will probably speak to you about it, and you will, of course, say what you like, but I'm pretty sure she won't take up the play again, and if she feels no coolness toward anybody, it won't be toward you."

"There's small consolation in that!" exclaimed Wallace.

"Anyhow, make the best of it, my dear fellow," said Kendal, as though determined to strike a lighter key. "Don't be so dismal; things will look differently to-morrow morning—they generally do—there's no tremendous harm done. I'm sorry I didn't do your bidding better. Honestly, when I come to think over it, I don't see how I could have done otherwise. But I don't expect you to think so."

Wallace laughed, protested and they parted.

A few moments later Kendal let himself into his rooms, where lights were burning, and threw himself into his reading chair, beside which his books and papers stood ready to his hand. Generally nothing gave him a greater sense of bien-être than this nightly return, after a day spent in society, to these silent and faithful companions of his life. He was accustomed to feel the atmosphere of his room when he came back to it charged with welcome. It was as though the thoughts and schemes he had left warm and safe in shelter there started to life again after a day's torpor, and thronged to meet him. His books smiled at him with friendly faces, the open page called to him to resume work of the morning. He was, in every sense, at home. To-night, however, the familiar spell seemed to have lost its force. After a hasty supper he took up some proofs, pen in hand. But the first page was hardly turned before they had dropped on to his knee. It seemed to him as if he still felt on his arm the folds of a green, fur-edged cloak, as if the touch of a soft, cold hand was still lingering in his. Presently he fell to recalling every detail of the afternoon scene—the arching beech trees, the rich red and brown of the earth beneath, tinged with the winter sheddings of the trees, the little raised bank, her eyes as she looked up at him, the soft wisps of her golden brown hair under her hat. What superb, unapproachable beauty it was! How living, how rich in content and expression!

"Am I in love with Isabel Bretherton?" he asked himself at last, lying back on his chair with his eyes on the portrait of his sister. "Perhaps Marie could tell me—I don't understand myself. I don't think so. And if I were, I am not a youngster, and my life is a tolerably full one. I could hold myself in and trample it down if it were best to do so. I can hardly imagine myself absorbed in a great passion. My bachelor life is a good many years old—my habits won't break up easily. And, supposing I felt the beginnings of it, I could stop it if reason were against it."

He left his chair, and began to pace up and down the room, thinking. "And there is absolutely no reason in my letting myself fall in love with Isabel Bretherton! She has never given me the smallest right to think that she takes any more interest in me than she does in hundreds of people whom she meets on friendly terms, unless it may be an intellectual interest, as Wallace imagines, and that's a poor sort of stepping-stone to love! And if it were ever possible that she should, this afternoon has taken away the possibility. For, however magnanimous a woman may be, a thing like that rankles; it can't help it. She will feel the sting of it worse to-morrow than to-day, and, though she will tell herself that she bears no grudge, it will leave a gulf between us. For, of course, she must go on acting, and, whatever depressions she may have, she must believe in herself; no one can go on working without it, and I shall always recall to her something harsh and humiliating!

"Supposing, by any chance, it were not so—supposing I were able to gather up my relation with her again and make it a really friendly one—I should take, I think, a very definite line. I should make up my mind to be of use to her. After all, it is true what she says; there are many things in me that might be helpful to her, and everything there was she should have the benefit of. I would make a serious business of it. She should find me a friend worth having."

His thoughts wandered on a while in this direction. It was pleasant to see himself in the future as Miss Bretherton's philosopher and friend, but in the end the sense of reality gained upon his dreams. "I am a fool!" he said to himself resolutely at last, "and I may as well go to bed and put her out of my mind. The chance is over—gone—done with, if it ever existed."

The next morning, on coming down to breakfast, he saw, among his letters a handwriting which startled him. Where had he seen it before? In Wallace's hand three days ago! He opened it and found the following note:

"My Dear Mr. Kendal,—You know, I think, that I am off next week—on Monday, if all goes well. We go to Switzerland for a while, and then to Venice, which people tell me is often very pleasant in August. We shall be there by the first of August, and Mr. Wallace tells me that he hears from you that your sister, Madame de Chateauvieux, will be there about the same time. I forgot to ask you yesterday, but, if you think she would not object to it, would you give me a little note introducing me to her? All that I have heard of her makes me very anxious to know her, and she would not find me a troublesome person! We shall hardly, I suppose, meet again before I start. If not, please remember that my friends can always find me on Sunday afternoon. Yours very truly,

"Isabel Bretherton."

Kendal's hand closed tightly over the note. Then he put it carefully back into its envelope, and walked away with his hands behind him and the note in them, to stare out of the window at the red roofs opposite.

"That is like her," he murmured to himself; "I wound and hurt her; she assumes I shall suffer for it, and, by way of setting up the friendly bond again, next day, with a word, she asks me to do her a kindness! Could anything be more delicate, more gracious?"

Kendal never had greater difficulty in fixing his thoughts to his work than that morning, and at last, in despair, he pushed his book aside, and wrote an answer to Miss Bretherton, and when that was accomplished, a long letter to his sister. The first took him longer than its brevity seemed to justify. It contained no references to anything but her request. He felt a compulsion upon him to treat the situation exactly as she had done, but, even this limitation, how much cordiality and respect would two sides of letter paper be made to carry with due regard to decorum and grammar!

When he next met Wallace, that hopeful, bright-tempered person had entirely recovered his cheerfulness. Miss Bretherton, he reported, had attacked the subject of Elvira with him, but so lightly that he had no opportunity for saying any of the skillful things he had prepared.

The great trouble about lending a man money to tide him over is that he doesn't always come up with the tide.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Commentary.—I. A heavenly visitor (vs. 8-11). 8. Manoah—Manoah's home was at Zorah, a place in the southeastern part of the tribe of Dan. This region was exposed to the ravages of the hostile Philistines, and it was here that the man was to be born who would use his great powers to harass this enemy of Israel. Intreated the Lord—Manoah was a man of prayer and of faith. Let the man of God........ come again—A reading of the first seven verses of this chapter will give the explanation of the facts mentioned regarding a former visit. Teach us what we shall do—Manoah and his wife believed what the angel of the Lord had said about a child being born to them, and they desired to know particularly what to do in the training of the child. The piety of Manoah is indicated in his prayer and in his interest in properly caring for the child that was promised. 9. God hearkened—Although the Lord had given specific directions to Manoah's wife, he listened to Manoah's prayer and answered it, thus repeating the promise and instructions. The angel of God—We have repeated instances in the Old Testament of visits of divine messengers to men. This messenger was clearly Deity manifested in human form. As she sat in the field—Pausing to rest, perhaps, as she was going or returning from some fountain to draw water. Dr. Robinson observed near the fountain of Zorah several women, "toiling upward toward the village, each with her jar of water on her head. The village, the fountain, the fields, the mountains, and the females bearing water, all," says he, "transported us back to ancient times, when in all probability the mother of Samson often in like manner visited the fountain and toiled homeward with her jar of water."—Whedon.

10.—The woman made haste—She evidently knew that her husband desired to see the one who had before appeared to her and made her the promise of a child. She went hastily to call him to come and see him. Showed her husband—Told her husband. 11. Manoah arose and went—He had prayed that the messenger might come again, and now that his prayer was being answered, he went to him, doing his part toward answering the prayer. Art thou the man—Manoah wished to be fully convinced that there was no mistake, for the matter under consideration was very important, therefore he asked this direct question. "Manoah's intense desire for the repetition of the angel's visit was prompted not by doubts or anxieties of any kind, but was the fruit of a lively faith, and of his great anxiety to follow out the instructions given."—J., F. & B. He came to be fully convinced that he was face to face with a messenger from God, with one who had authority.

II. Instructions given (vs. 12-14). 12. now let thy words come to pass—Some render this clause, "Now thy words shall come to pass." There is a close connection between this expression and the question which follows, as if Manoah had said, "Now that it is coming to pass, how shall we, etc. What shall be the ordering of the child (R. V.)—Manoah was anxious to know how to meet the great responsibility that was being placed upon him and his wife. The angel of the Lord had told his wife that he that was to be born of her and her husband should "begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines," hence he was to be an important personage. Manoah believed that unusual care and training should be given. He wished to hear for himself the directions that had already been given. 13. the angel of the Lord said unto Manoah—As the Lord had heard Manoah's prayer for a second visit of the heavenly visitor, so he heeded his request for a second statement of directions about the child. Of all that I said let her beware—There was no new instruction to be given, and no instructions that she had received were to be neglected. While the directions which God has given in his word and gives by his Spirit are of great importance, many treat them with indifference.

14. cometh of the vine—Directions for carrying out of the vow of a Nazarite are given in Num. 6. 1-21. In verse 3 of that passage it is said that he who takes the vow "shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes, or dried." The mother in this case was required to observe strictly the Nazarite vow until her child was born, for it was foretold and commanded that he should be a Nazarite from his birth. Neither let her drink wine or strong drink—The Hebrew "yain," the Greek "oinos," our wine, are the same word. It is connected with a root signifying to ferment, from whence also comes "yawen," mud. The "shecar," or strong drink, seems to have been distilled from corn, honey or dates. From it is derived the verb "shacar," to be drunk.—Cam. Bib. The use of intoxicating liquors is thus declared in the Scriptures to be harmful and is again and again forbidden. Nor eat any unclean thing—She must observe the law of Moses carefully with respect to the kinds of food that were forbidden. All that I commanded her—The record of these commands is in verses 4 and 5 of this chapter.

III. A sacrifice offered (vs. 15, 16). 15. Let us detain thee—With true Oriental hospitality Manoah urged the messenger to remain and eat of the meal he would prepare for him. He was earnest in his request, especially because the mission to him was of great importance and had brought great joy to him and his wife; for they had no children. 16. I will not eat of thy bread—Manoah did not know that it was the angel of the Lord to whom he offered food. This statement of the angel's turned Manoah from his purpose to offer him food. Offer it unto the Lord—This language evidently suggested to Manoah the propriety of making an offering to the Lord. The angel in this remark did not deny His divinity. Manoah went forward and made a sacrifice to God after asking the angel the angel his name. The angel said, "Wherefore askest thou after my name, seeing it is wonderful?" (v. 18, R. V.). Some writers think that fire came miraculously and consumed the sacrifice. The angel went up toward heaven in the flame of the burning sacrifice and Manoah and his wife looked on in amazement. They fell on their faces. Manoah thought they had seen God and was afraid. His wife answered Manoah's remark in the clear and logical reasoning of verse 23.

IV. Samson, the deliverer (vs. 24, 25). 24. Called his name Samson. The name signifies, according to Josephus, one that is strong. Some have doubted this signification, because the root "shemesh" means the sun; but Fuerst shows that from the sense of being bright, shining, comes easily the metaphorical sense of being distinguished, strong. Hence the name means a distinguished hero.—Whedon. The Lord blessed him—Samson was a child of promise and was given for a special work. The Lord endowed him with those peculiar powers that he could use in the work for which he had raised him up. 25. The Spirit of the Lord began to move him—He began to realize his strength, and it would appear that there was unfolded to him the nature of the task which lay before him.

Questions.—What powerful enemy was oppressing Israel? To what tribe of Israel did Manoah belong? What message came to Manoah's wife? What prayer did Manoah offer to God? Describe the answer of the prayer. Who was the angel of the Lord? What question did Manoah ask the angel? What question did Manoah ask the angel? What was Manoah's wife forbidden to eat or drink? What are the effects of the use of strong drink? Describe the offering that Manoah made to the Lord. What was the son of Manoah and his wife named? For what purpose was he raised up? When did he begin to realize his strength?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic—Parenthood.

I. Under divine guidance.
II. Its national importance.

I. Under divine guidance. In the marvellous ordering of divine providence nothing is more calculated to lift human life into its highest ranges of experiences than parenthood. It brings a new dignity, the sense of which connects the task of those who have it with the creative energy of God. The tide of life is felt to rise as the new office and the new responsibility are grasped. It is the coronation of life, and the child, drawing father and mother to itself, is rightly the object of keenest interest and most tender care. In more than one story of the Bible the motherhood of a simple peasant woman gave rise to divine communications and supernatural hopes. Manoah's wife was a true interpreter of the divine thought. She was a woman with a great soul and a large heart, to whom God was a reality. She had a great longing for the deliverance of Israel, for something heroic in history in which God would vindicate his might and grandeur above the heathen gods. Without hesitation the angel of Jehovah spake to her in the field. Her bright hopefulness rested on a solid foundation. She stated her case to Manoah with wonderful simplicity and clearness, giving three reasons for her consolatory assurance of deliverance from death, namely, accepted sacrifices, gracious revelations and precious promises. The answer to many a prayer of hope was coming and in their own home the hero was to be cradled. Conscious of ignorance and inexperience, and feeling the weight of responsibility, Manoah and his wife desired to have authoritative direction in their duty. They magnified their humility, faith and devotion in their prayer for guidance. Here were two Hebrew peasants living in a period of Philistine domination more than a thousand years before the Christian era. The child that was to be born, a gift of God, a divine charge, was promised to these parents. The gift was made in a very solemn manner, and under the express condition that he was to be trained to live, not for himself or his family alone, but for God, to whom he was consecrated at his earliest existence. That consecration of his life to God his parents deeply impressed on his mind and taught him as they could the worship of the unseen Jehovah in the sacrifices at the altar, in prayer for protection and prosperity. So much was involved in the duty of his mother that she was distinctly instructed as to her own manner of life.

II. Its national importance. In a very special sense this child was a gift to his nation. Samson's lot in life fell upon a period of utter national demoralization, but he was born to a woman who longed for a boy, and to her son she transmitted her hope, her faith and her enthusiasm. Israel had lapsed into subjugation to the despised Philistines. All national spirit was dying out and the prestige of Jehovah was giving way to the prestige of Dagon. Samson was to be a first instrument in the deliverance of Israel, and because of this fact parental anxiety was doubling as to their part in his training, both in instruction and government for mind and body. Circumstances must be understood that discipline might fit the young life for its place. His radiant health and uncommon physical energy, even in boyhood, were to himself and others the sign of a divine blessing, which maintained his sense of consecration. Samson needed extraordinary gifts for extraordinary work. He had to subdue the Philistines and reanimate the courage of the Hebrews. Samson was a sign to Israel. His life was a sort of parable exhibiting in a strange but striking form what would have been Israel's experience if they had been faithful. Like the nation of Israel Samson was consecrated to God. The remarkable thing in his life was that, while he continued faithful in his consecration, he possessed wonderful bodily strength, but the moment the Nazarite vow was broken he became weak as other men. The nation was taught symbolically what wonderful strength would be theirs if they would be faithful to their covenant with Jehovah. T. R. A.

A MAZE OF LIES.

(Montreal Telegraph)

In one pamphlet Germany wants nothing; in another she is going to help herself to whatever takes her fancy, which is about everything. In one Germany tried to negotiate peace; in another her hour of destiny had come and she was going to strike. In another she is an enormous colossus that stands alone between the world and universal peace. And so it goes—a maze of contradictory pamphlets, frantically striving to keep the people of this continent from drawing their own deductions from Germany's treatment of Belgium. But the gem of the whole collection is Dr. Dernburg's statement that "the German people do not covet one inch of foreign territory on the surface of the earth!"

ON THE DEFENSIVE.

(Chicago Tribune)

It is possible that the renewal of an energetic offensive by the Germans in France and Flanders which could not be undertaken without a withdrawal of troops from the eastern area, reflects a misgiving in the German general staff that a defensive role must be accepted in the east from now on because of Austro-Hungarian politics.

THE BRITISH FIGHTER

(By Walt Mason)

This is a recent prose poem by the well-known bard of Emporia, Kansas. Walt Mason is a Canadian-American, born in Columbus, Ont.

Whenever dauntless eyes have smiled serenely in the face of doom, whenever man has tamed the wild and made the howling desert bloom, whenever pioneer has tilled the virgin clay, wherever settlers hew and build, the British fighter led the way. The fighter of a thousand years, his deeds all history records; he circled both the hemispheres to find his dangers and rewards; his bones are buried in the deep, and in the snows of Hudson's Bay; wherever men their outposts keep, the British fighter led the way. Wherever there are lonely trails which lead away to No Man's Land, wherever there are purple sails, by breezes to strange harbors fanned, wherever grim adventures lure, from Artic waste to far Cathay, where'er men struggle and endure, the British fighter leads the way. And better still, wherever Right would break the rusty chains of Wrong and make a beacon in the night to guide the wailing world along wherever Justice lifts her sword, the slimy enemy to slay, the British battle cry is roared, the British fighter leads the way.

SECOND AIR SHIP RAID

The raid of German airships on the Norfolk coast of England last week was another of the "Baby Killer" class. It was destructive of the lives of several non-combatants, women and children among the number, but the damage to property was not serious. It was at first supposed that Zeppelins were employed, but later reports indicate that only aeroplanes only were used. The object evidently was to terrorize the residents of the eastern coast cities, and to give the German flying men practice, with a view to a greater invasion later. The night being one of dense darkness the invaders could not be seen and an effective counter attack made. It should put the British authorities on their mettle to guard against the larger attack, when it is made, which may result more disastrously to the invaders than the invaded.

This adding of the terrors of the air to the terrors of war on land and sea gives to the world an idea of the abuses to which modern inventions may be put, especially by an unscrupulous nation bent on world conquest, regardless of the means to be employed. The British air fleet has confined its operations entirely to the demolition of airship hangers. It has never sought destruction of noncombatants. Retaliation on Prussian lines is now being advocated in England, but we believe the British people will never be induced to enter the "baby killer" class. Victory may be delayed, but it will come without resort to inhuman methods.

THE NEW MONSTER

The lesson of the war up to date, from a military or naval standpoint has been the power of the submarine. We need not at all agree with those hysterical persons, who think that battleships will have to be scrapped in the near future, to admit that heretofore the under-sea boat has been curiously underrated.

One reason for this may have been the little part taken in war by the navies of the world during the past century. The Spanish navy in the Spanish-American war, and the Russian navy in the Russia-Japanese war, were utterly worthless. Hence naval construction since the introduction of the iron ship has been along the lines of theory, unchecked by practical experiment and demonstration. Navies have been measured almost altogether in dreadnoughts, and the deadly assassin of the battleship has been almost ignored.

A writer in McClure's magazine claims that the submarine was practicaly invented by a Connecticut Yankee namely Bushnell, in 1771, greatly improved and developed by Robert Fulton, and finally perfected out many years ago by John P. Holland, an Irish-American. Yet neither the United States nor England have specialized on the submarine. The French, in that respect have led the world. If Germany had the French submarines, the British fleet would be in more danger.

A SCOTCH-AMERICAN.

I've never been tae Scotland
An' canna speak the Scotch;
I'll blame ye nane for sayin'
This stunt o' mine's a botch.
For I was born in Denver,
My bride I'll nae conceal,
An' though ye brag aboot it
I dinna like oatmeal.

I've heard about the laverock
That soars and sings aboon
The gloamin' 'oor that kisses
Yer cheeks when day is done.
But oot in a' directions
We've got a meadaw lark.
Wha's liquid notes in torrents
Resound frae dawn tae dark.

I've heard about the heather
Ablaze on Scottish hills,
The thistle an' the gowans
An' magic o' their thrills:
An' I don't blame you either,
Nae doot they're wondrous floors,
But we have scores tae match them
Upon our spreading moors.

I've heard about the bannocks
An' kebbucks mither made,
The oatcakes, scones an' treacle
An' orange marmalade.
But here's a wee bit secret,
I've tasted them mysel,,
An' dinna like them better
Than hotch-patch, brose or kale.

Yer lasses an' yer laddies
Are winners I'll admit,
Wi' beauty everlastin'
An' never-failin' grit.
Nae wonder yer wee country
Stan's high among the great,
And for a grander people
This warl' will lang while wait.

An mayhe that yer oatmeal—
Yer kebbucks an' yer kale—
Had some hand in the makin'
O' Scotland, who can tell?
If I was born ower yonder,
As maist o' ye hae been,
I'll ring the praise tae Heaven
O' a' things Scotch I ken.

So nane will feel offended
At weel-meant jokes o' mine,
For I was born in Denver,
The city ca'd "divine".
An' though yer pipes may delve me,
Though brose I canna down;
Three cheers for bonnie Scotland
An' three for Denver town.

AFRAID SHE WAS DYING

Suffered Terribly Until She Took "Fruit-a-tives"

ST. JEAN DE MATHA, JAN. 27th. 1914.

"After suffering for a long time with Dyspepsia, I have been cured by "Fruit-a-tives". I suffered so much that I would not dare eat for I was afraid of dying. Five years ago, I received samples of "Fruit-a-tives". I did not wish to try them for I had little confidence in them but, seeing my husband's anxiety, I decided to do so and at once I felt relief. Then I sent for three boxes and I kept improving until I was cured. While sick, I lost several pounds, but after taking "Fruit-a-tives", I quickly regained what I had lost. Now I eat, sleep and digest well—in a word, I am completely cured, thanks to "Fruit-a-tives".

57 ALREADY DEAD.

In the three months to date there have been 57 deaths among Canadian troops at Salisbury. Of these 21 died of spinal meningitis. Also a large number of cases of pneumonia proved fatal. There were several accidental deaths and two suicides. With the removal of the troops from their swampy quarters it is expected the death rate will decrease.

WINGHAM MAN KILLED.

Wingham, Jan. 26.—John French, of Wingham, has been killed in action while fighting for Britain. His wife has received official notification of his death, after hearing rumors of it. When she first heard of the fatality, Mrs. French thought it might be a man of the same name who belongs to St. Thomas. Then a friend wrote her that he had helped to bury her husband and another that he had fired the last salute over his body. This has been followed by the official statement, ending all uncertainty. John French left Wingham at the outbreak of war, he being a British reservist. He leaves a family of five small children.

NO FEBRUARY FULL MOON.

According to Mr. Joseph Graham of Bathurst, near London, says the London Free Press, for the second time since the creation of the world the month of February will be without a full moon. According to information in his possession, obtained in a copy of Tit Bits of the year 1891, in answer to a question as to whether there had ever been a month in which there was no full moon, an astronomer stated that in February 1866, there had been no full moon, and it was predicted that the phenomena would not happen again for 2,500,000 years. According to Mr. Graham, this year there will be a full moon on January 30 and on March 30, but none in February.

BELGIANS WILL NOT COME

The Children's Aid Society has received official intimation that there will be no Belgian orphans sent to Canada, for the present at least, to be adopted by kindly people here who have read about their plight. The Consul General for Belgium, Ottawa, has advised the head of the Children's Aid Society in Canada, that the little orphans who have been temporarily separated from their parents have been adopted by relatives who do not wish to give them up. There does not appear to be any occasion for action at present. The Society has received between forty and fifty applications from interested families in Bruce County for one or more of the little Belgian children for adoption.

For offering butter for sale in unprinted wrappers the merchants of an Ontario town paid over $100 in fines one day recently. Butter wrappers must be printed to show whether dairy or creamery butter is contained therein. The unprincipaled people have been defrauding the public by working dairy butter and labelling it creamery, because the latter sells at a few cents higher per pound generally. This is why the Government has made a regulation providing that all wrappers must be plainly printed. Leave your orders for printed wrappers at The Telescope office.

TEAMS THROWN OUT.

The result of the protest made by the Owen Sound O.H.A. executive against Markdale and the counter protest lodged against Owen Sound by the Markdale club is that both teams have been suspended, Owen Sound for the season and Markdale indefinitely. Owen Sound protest against Markdale on the ground that the latter had played Staples, who was over age and Mercer, under his brother's certificate. The Markdale club at once retaliated by protesting Bell under residence rule and Foote, for playing without a certificate. The protests were heard on Wednesday with the result stated. This puts both Owen Sound and Markdale out of the junior O.H.A. this winter.

SEITZ IN TORONTO.

The Toronto Globe says—When Ernest Seitz began at 6 years old to play the piano so it gave his hearers pleasure affection may have seen success of some sort in the future, but no one quite looked forward to the success which greeted trained genius last night. In the gallery were two who hardly dared let themselves realize how good it was and one was a handsome man, who replied to a question, "Yes, I'm his Dad," and the other was a pretty woman, whose face was framed and crowned by soft grey hair and whose eyes were tear-filled as she turned to reply to congratulations which rained in upon her for her boy's triumph. Another one who listened, keenly intent on every note, was Mrs. Hutchinson, who had spent eighteen hours in a journey from New York to hear the twenty-two-year-old genius, for her husband had trained that genius in its budding days. Among the large and fashionable audience who heard Seitz were Mr. W. D. and the Misses Cargill.

Assessor Wanted

APPLICATION will be received by the undersigned up till noon on Monday the [illegible] day of February, for the Office of Assessor of the TOWNSHIP OF BRANT for the year 1915.

By order,
M. A. McCallum,
Clerk.

MANY HYMNS DISCARDED.

Over one hundred hymns in the present Presbyterian Book of Praise will be discarded if the new compilation prepared for congregational singing by a special committee is finally accepted by the next General Assembly. And besides the dropping of these hymns, the committee will also recommend that 48 selections from Psalter be committed and others substituted. The abstract of the proposed revision of the Presbyterian Book of Praise has just reached the ministers and is being perused with great care especially by a special committee appointed to consider the changes. This committee, convened by Rev. R. C. Tibbs, has as its members Dr. Davidson, Dr. McGillivray, Dr. McKay, Dr. McTavish, Rev. W. G. Back, Rev. M. A. McEachern (Brampton), and Professor Abbott. It will hold sessions during the next two weeks. The old Book of Praise contained 621 hymns; the number in the new book, the number of omissions may reach 630. Thirty one psalms have been added, and the new hymns number 145. Despite the fact that several popular child hymns used in the Sunday Schools, have been left out of the new book, the number of hymns for the young has been much increased.

BRUCE MEN IN NEW YORK.

At the montnly dinner of the Canadian Club, of New York, held at the Hotel Savoy on Tuesday evening, January 12th, at which there were about 200 present, the guest of honor was the new Premier of Ontario, W. H. Hearst, who delivered a masterly address on Canada and the War. "The Men from Bruce," ten in number, members of the Club, living in New York City, presented the Premier with a set of embossed resolutions, the captain of which was "The Man from Bruce." Thomas D. Nerdlands, Vice President of the Club and Chairman of the Entertainment Committee, an old Southampton boy, made the presentation address and in doing so gave a biographical sketch of the Premier in which he referred to the sturdy old Bruce pioneers, neighbors and associates of the Hearts in Arran township. Rowley Reid and Joseph E. Reid, now both successful druggists in Brooklyn also Southampton boys, were among the signers. Mr. Hearst was much touched and suprised and made a feeling reply.

MOTHER AND SON.

"O little son, O little son, why sob you in affright?
What hear you in the night?"
"O mother mine, O mother mine, I pray thee hold me tight,
I hear the roar of many guns. There is a dreadful sight!"
"O little son, O little son, there is no beam or gleam;
It must be but a dream."
"O mother mine, O mother mine, I hear the bullets scream,
And dead men lie with staring eyes beside a swollen stream."
"O little son, O little son, it may not—may not be,
This awful agony."
"O mother mine, O mother mine, the vision will not flee:
And, mother mine, among them there my father's face I see!"

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

BRAVE CAVALRYMAN'S DEED.

"The bravest deed I have witnessed during many weeks' fighting," was how one of the Royal Horse Guards described the seizing of a gun under the very noses of an advancing horde of Germans.

"Somt 200 of us," he said, "had been having hot work in some trenches we had occupied for two days and nights.

"Early one morning we were suddenly shelled and attacked by an overwhelming force of Germans.

"The enemy came on in a dense mass, and we blazed away with our rifles and a Maxim at a terrific rate. They must have suffered terrible loss.

"After firing for some time we found we had used up every bit of ammunition, and then, of course, there was nothing to do but retire from our trenches.

"Suddenly one of our men, who had been in charge of the Maxim gun, now abandoned in the trench, let go a real cavalryman's oath. Then he turned in his flight and raced back to the trench like one possessed.

"It was a race with the odds against him.

"He was 200 yards from the trench when he started back, and from the other side hundreds of Germans were also advancing upon it, shooting as they ran.

"Bullets were whizzing all about our men, but he didn't seem to find.

"He reached the trench first. We saw him tear at the Maxim gun for a moment—two or three of the oncoming Germans leaped into the trench—there was a short, sharp scuffle. Our man had only an unfixed bayonet, but he did good work with it, and then, tearing himself free, he succeeded in rejoining us without being bowled over.

"Then as with bleeding hands he triumphantly held up the lock of the Maxim gun, we raised a great cheer.

"It was a reckless sort of thing to attempt, but brave—yes, the bravest deed I have witnessed during many weeks of fighting."

TWO MORE V. C's.

The King has approved of the grant of the Victoria Cross to Second Lieutenant James Leach and to Sergeant John Hogan, 2nd Battalion, the Manchester Regiment, for conspicuous bravery near Festubert on October 29, when, after their trench had been taken by the Germans and after two attempts to recapture had failed, they voluntarily decided on the afternoon of the same day to recover the trench themselves, and, working from traverse to traverse at close quarters with great bravery, they gradually succeeded in regaining possession, killing 8 of the enemy, wounding 2, and making 16 prisoners.

The number of V. C's. given to soldiers during the present war now totals 27.

The President of the French Republic has bestowed the decoration of the Legion of Honor on the undermentioned officers, with the approval of His Majesty the King, for their gallantry during the operations between Aug. 21 and 30 with the Expeditionary Force.

Croix de Crevalier—Captain J. J. O'Keefe, M. B., Royal Army Medical Corps.

RECORD WEDDING SEASON.

The last five months of 1914 will long be remembered not only on account of the world's greatest war, but also on account of the enormous number of marriages hastened and celebrated because the bridegrooms were hurrying off to serve their country.

Since the beginning of August nearly all the weddings have been "khaki" weddings. Furthermore, there has been a great increase, estimated at 50 per cent., in the number of marriages by licence. This has been the case not only in London, but also throughout the kingdom.

ONLY GOVERNMENT GUNS NOW.

Birmingham gunmakers are much disturbed by the new Government order prohibiting the sale or manufacture of arms of a military character. Under the order no arms above .23 may be manufactured. It is understood that the prohibition applies to all firms not actually making arms or ammunition for the Government. The firms chiefly affected will be about fifty, who have been equipping rifle corps and similar bodies all over the country.

The gun trade section of the Chamber of Commerce has the matter under consideration.

DEATH OF 3 CRIMEAN VETERANS.

The oldest Crimean veteran, Josiah Pearce, aged ninety-two, died on Tuesday week at Portsmouth. Pearce was shipwrecked in the Harbinger before the battle of Alma.

At Warlingham, Surrey, on Tuesday week the funeral took place of Robert Haines, aged eighty-mour, who served at Sebastopol. After leaving the army Haines was an attendant at the House of Commons.

There has also just died at Cambridge Sergeant Joseph Egan, aged seventy-three, who as a boy of thirteen served at Inkermann, Alma and Sebastopol.

BULL'S-EYES FOR THE TRENCH.

Writing to Mr. Marston, of the FishingGazette, Lieutenant-Colonel Stanley Barry, A.D.C. to Sir John French, says:

"I really think the men now are well supplied with cigarettes. The latest thing they are asking for is 'peppermint bull's-eyes' — the zebra balls type—they are warming in the trenches. I think a consignment of these would be more appreciated than cigarettes, odd as it may sound, if packed in small tins for easy distribution."

NOTES.

Seven thousand seven-stone bags of flour have arrived at Sheffield, being Canada's gift to the city and district for the relief of distress during the war. Each bag is marked "Canada's Gift."

Arthur Robert Glaves (70), a grinder, of 14 Alexandra road, Sheffield, died in Ecclesall Union Hospital as the result of taking a quantity of liniment.

A special meeting of the Licensing Justices of Rotherham decided that on and after December 28 the sale of intoxicating liquor should be suspended during the hours from 10 p.m. until 6 a.m.

A man and his wife were killed on the Midland Railway at Blackwell Station, near Birmingham, on Wednesday afternoon week. Walter Taylor, aged fifty, of Smithwick, had been discharged during the day from Blackwell Sanatorium and, with his wife, was awaiting a train for Birmingham.

Musical instruments will be allowed the battalions of the new Armies.

The Queen is sending 15,000 pairs of socks as a personal gift to the troops in South Africa.

Sergeant A. MacDonald, 2nd Batt. the King's Own (Yorkshire Light Infantry), has been decorated with the French military medal for gallantry during the operations between August 21 and 30.

Mr. Goss Overton, who has just died in his eightieth year, was for forty-two years in the service of Queen Victoria and King Edward as head park and game keeper. The red deer in Windsor Park would come at his call and feed out of his hand.

At the meeting of the Penistone Education Sub-committee, Mr. A. Hamby, of Dodworth, was appointed head master of the Hunshelf Council School.

The death took place at Terrington, near Malton, of James Hawkins, at the age of 79, and on Monday his wife passed away. They were interred together.

The death has occurred at the age of 83 years, of Mr. Edwin Spurr, for very many years the tenant of Rose Farm, Walton, near Wakefield, from which he retired a few years ago. Deceased was a well-known figure in agricultural circles, and a prominent member of the West Riding Chamber of Agriculture. For many years he occupied a seat on the Wakefield Board of Guardians.

An inch of snow fell on the hills from Matlock to Buxton on Saturday week.

Up to the present Chapel-en-le-Frith has sent about 150 men to the colors.

Joseph Carrington (69), married, of Lower Somercotes, a furnaceman, employed at Messrs. James Oakes and Company's Riddings Iron Works, who was severely burned about the back and legs, through the bursting of molten slag, on 11th of December, has succumbed to his injuries at the Nottingham General Hospital.

The Retford Town Council, by a large majority, appointed Dr. Beale as medical officer of health for the borough, medical officer to the elementary schools, and registrar of births under the Registration of Births Act (1907.)

The death occurred on Monday week at his brother's residence at Dunstable, of Mr. A. O. Janes, for many years the brilliant captain of the Notts County Cricket Club, and who went out to Australia as leader of an M. C. C. team. Deceased was 42 years of age.

There is a serious epidemic of measles in Birmingham and a high mortality. With the view of checking the heavy death-roll the medical officer of health is arranging a nursing experiment. A special measles nurse is to be appointed to nurse the cases in a particular area, and if the innovation is successful it will be extended to other parts of the city. Week before last there were 309 fresh cases with 26 deaths.

A verdict of Found Drowned was returned at Cardiff at the inquest on William Ahearne, managing director of the Bandon Hosiery Company, Limited, Bandon, County Cork, whose body was taken from the Glamorganshire Canal at Cardiff on Saturday.

In response to the representations of Mr. G. F. Hohler, M. P. for Chatham, the Admiralty has awarded a good conduct medal to Mr. James Hamilton, of Gillingham, who left the navy twenty years ago after twenty-five years' service. All arrears of pension carried by the medal will be paid.

Three deaths have occurred at Derby as a result of an accident at the new buildings in course of erection for the Derby Co-operative Society. Cornice stones were being fixed over the portico and a block of nearly three tons had been set. Another piece of nearly a ton was laid on top, which somehow caused the stones to overbalance, and they fell crashing through the scaffolding. Jack Travis, mason, died almost immediately, while William Drabble, mason, and Arthur Udale, laborer, succumbed to their injuries in hospital later.

When three laborers were engaged alongside the wharf at Devonport in a large boat mooring a battleship North Yard last Friday week the suction of the propellor of the warship drew the boat with its occupants under the water. Two of the laborers, William Beer and Archibald Penrose, were not seen again.

The police and military have removed from the front of Liberty Hall, the Larkinite headquarters in Dublin, a large streamer, on which were the words: "We serve neither King nor Kaiser, but Ireland."

Mr. H. P. Williams, of Pontyclun, Glamorgan, registrar and high bailiff of the Merthyr Tydfil County Court, formerly in practice in Rhyl as a solicitor, who died leaving unsettled property of the gross value of £7,867 2s 3d, made his will on a sheet of newspaper and named no executor. He also made an alteration in the will, which was not attested, and consequently an affidavit was required from the attesting witnesses.

Widespread sympathy is felt for the well-known artist, Mr. Walter Crane, in the death of his wife, Mrs. Mary Frances Crane. The deceased lady, who was 68 years old, had suffered very much from sleeplessness and nervous debility, and latterly had been staying for a rest cure at Finn Farm, Kingsworth. Her health seemed to have improved, but on Friday week her body was found on the railway a short distance from a level crossing, her skull having been fractured. A verdict of suicide while of unsound mind was returned at the inquest at Ashford.

A couple whose joint ages are 158 were married at Northampton lately. The bridegroom, Mr. William Mann, of Lower Heyford, is 81, and was being married for the third time. His bride, Mrs. Elizabeth Green, aged 77, was making her second marriage. The bridegroom, one of a family of twenty-four, has worked in the boot trade for seventy years.

The crew of the cruiser Nottingham sent a cheque to the Mayor of the city after which their ship is named to be expended in providing a Christmas diner for the poor children.

The people of the town and county of Nottingham have sent 90,000 articles of comfort to Nottingham soldiers in the fighting line. These included 5,000 2-lb. plum puddings, 5,000 lbs. of chocolate, 5,000 pairs of mittens, and thousands of tins of useful requisites, including boracic ointment. Over £2,200 was subscribed in less than twelve days.

At Reading Christmas Cattle Market three fat geese realized £190. The birds had been presented and sold and resold, the proceeds being for providing Christmas comforts for the Royal Berkshire Regiment. The Lord Chief Justice and the present member for Reading (Captain Leslie Wilson) were among the bidders by post.

Thomas Taylor, aged 101, on whom an inquest was held at Little Stretton, Shropshire, was said to have died as the result of a fall downstairs. He had worked as a tailor until a few years ago. He was the oldest of a family of five, and his youngest sister living was 94. His father lived to be 102. A verdict of accidental death was returned.

Mr. George Lockyer, of Sholing, near Southampton, and member of the Urban District Council of Itchen, has only missed one meeting in ten years. He has attended 262 council meetings and 454 committee meetings.

Sir Henry Grey died suddenly at Enville Hall, near Stourbridge, lately. He had been ill only a few days. He was a former High Sheriff of Worcestershire and had accepted the mayoralty of the newly created borough of Stourbridge. He was latterly in command of the reserve regiment of the Worcestershire Yeomanry, who are drilling at Worcester.

Attacks on the windows of several German pork butchers shops were made in Sunderland by a crowd incensed at the bombardment of Hartlepool and at the quashing of the conviction of the ex-German Consul Ahlers. The crowd numbered about 2,000. Many of them were provided with empty beer bottles, and with these they demolished the windows. The police could do nothing owing to the overwhelming number of the crowd. No one was arrested and no one was hurt.

Leaving estate of £22,426 gross, Mr. James Brebner, of Wellington, Surrey, left £500 to his daughter, Edith, £100 and one year's wages to his housekeeper, if in his service, one year's wages to each servant of one year's service, and the residue of his estate in equal shares to charitable institutions.

Mr. Masterman, the Liberal Minister, the rejected of Bethnal Green and Ipswich, was adopted as Liberal candidate for the Swansea district parliamentary division in succession to Sir D. Brynmor Jones, who has been appointed a Master in Lunacy. The meeting of delegates at Neath was uproarious at times.

The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has awarded its silver medal for animal life saving for two actions courageously performed during the German bombardment of Whitby—namely, to James White, a boy, who pluckily brought to a standstill his runaway horse, frightened by the bursting shells, and to the relatives of William Edward Tunmore, 61, who was unfortunately killed by a piece of shell while leading a horse of the North-Eastern Railway Company to a place of safety.

The Hon. Hew Dalrymple has been selected at Unionist candidate to represent Wigtownshire in place of Lord Dalrymple, the new Earl of Stair, who is a prisoner of war in Germany. Captain Edward Orde Stewart, of the Grenadier Guards, now serving in France, was chosen as prospective candidate at the next general election.

The death has occurred in Wolverhampton Workhouse in his 80th year of David Jennings, claimant to an estate in Chancery popularly known as the "Jennings Millions." Last September the deceased slipped and sustained a fractured leg. Death resulted after three months' illness from shock and exhaustion. At the inquest a verdict of accidental death was returned.

RIGHT ABOUT FACE! MARCH AND FOLLOW MILITARY FASHIONS

Dame Fashion has sounded the military note, and every one of her loyal devotees has fallen in line ready to march under the new and very fetching military colors.

Just to prove that she's still consistent "neutral," the military maid wears the Dove of Peace perched on her Tommy Atkins hat and safely out of reach of the court-plaster rifle, now the favorite beauty match of the fashion brigade.

WOMEN IN BUSINESS.

A business woman doesn't have to fib about her age nowadays. Mature years are a positive asset in many cases and a woman of 35 and even 40 and over has twice as good a chance for employment now as she had a dozen years ago. This is the day of the intelligent, well equipped woman in the business world.

A place was recently left vacant on the staff of a concern publishing several magazines dealing with the general interests of women. In behalf of a woman living out of town a man friend called on the editor and set forth the qualifications of the applicant.

"What's her age?" asked the editor.

"Forty," was the reply, given in a rather apologetic tone.

Incidentally when the forty-year old applicant called at the office she was introduced to the woman who had been ahead of her and secured the place. She had iron gray hair and must have been at least 50, but her keen eyes, trim figure and careful grooming would have made her a credit to any office, aside from her mental qualifications.

What is called in a general way social service work has furnished a broad field of employment for the woman of mature years. This line of work includes investigators for charity organizations, where the services of young women would be obviously impossible. Night calls are frequent, as conditions must be studied as they exist when the wage earners of the family are at home, in order to arrive at the facts in the case.

Many middle aged women are also engaged in welfare work in connection with corporations employing a large number of women, trained nurses and teachers being especially adapted to such duties. In all this sort of work, which involves house to house visiting, age, experience and knowledge of the world are valuable assets.

With the growth of what is called the cottage system of schools, sanitariums and various institutions a mature woman as house mother is one of the most difficult places to fill. To have reached the age of 50 is no disadvantage in such a case, and widows with married children, and even grandchildren, are to-day filling such places all over the country.

In business offices the tendency to regard added years as an advantage when hiring a woman is also noticeable. The best dressed and most dignified appearing of the self-supporting women in the downtown business district are no longer the youngest. There are many bookkeepers, private secretaries and confidential clerks who are well past the forty year mark and who command high salaries. One business man put the situation thus:

"Give me a woman clerk well on toward 40. She's in all probability past he 'beau age' and realizes that she's likely to have to support herself for the rest of her life. She wants a permanent job. This makes her keen to succeed in what she undertakes and she generally makes good."

War News Affected Her.

Many people who have been reading the terrible war news from day to day, especially those who have relatives at the seat of war, have become so nervous that it is impossible for them to sleep.

The nerves have become unstrung and the heart perhaps affected.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills will build up the unstrung nervous system and strengthen the weak hear.

Miss Hildia Dicaire, Martintown, Ont., writes: "In August, 1914, I was out of school for my health. I was visiting friends in London, and heard of the war. It made me so nervous that I could not sleep, but after using Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills I improved greatly, and could take my school again. I have recommended them to many of my friends."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25 at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

The Blood-Guiltiness of Germany

(Winnipeg Free Press.)

First hand acquaintance with German performances in Belgium moves neutral observers to righteous wrath against those responsible — all except Irvin S. Cobb, of the Saturday Evening Post, who in the midst of the carnage, remained quite cool. Mr. Cobb since returning to the atmosphere of the United States, has found it possible to write about the war without stopping over in every other paragraph about these marvellous supermen, the German officers; but he is evidently bound by a solemn vow never to let his pen wander into writing anything that could be construed into a reflection upon his late hosts.

Not that Mr. Cobb does not write with vividness and imaginative power about these horrors of war. But one would never learn from his writings that they are due to the calculated brutality and savagery of men. He deals with them in a large, cool, impersonal way, as the tragic harvest of Fate. He does not tell us that men slaughtered, houses sacked, towns burned by a drunken, murderous soldiery under orders from blood-thirsty officers; in his philosophy these things, frightful as they are, are merely inevitable incidents in warfare—part of the regular programme. Nobody is responsible for them, nobody is to blame for them, to say that they take place in war time is fully to account for them.

BELGIUM, VICTIM OF GERMANY.

Mr. Cobb's explanation of how it happened that this tide of misery, murder, arson and rapine flowed over orderly, prosperous, peaceable Belgium is entirely characteristic of his method. This is what he says:

"They have called Belgium the cockpit of Europe. She is, too. In wars that were neither of her making nor her choosing she has borne the hardest blows—a poor little buffer State thrust in between great and truculent neighbors. To strike at one another they must strike at Belgium."

This is a mean and cowardly way of putting it, obviously of making it appear that all the belligerent powers are equally responsible for the disaster to Belgium. The violation of Belgium's neutrality was not inevitable as Mr. Cobb implied. France and Germany fought out their differences in 1870-71, without a single soldier crossing the Belgium frontier.

Germany's treatment of Belgium will pass into history as the classic example of treachery and bad faith between nations. In all history there is nothing to compare with it in malice and hypocrisy. In 1870 Bismarck, in entering into a special treaty with Great Britain for the protection of Belgium said that "in view of the treaties in force this is quite superfluous."

In 1911 the German ambassador at Brussels, under instructions from the German government, waited upon the Belgian government, which had been disturbed by the nature of the discussion about the Dutch proposal to fortify Flushing, to assure them "that Germany had no intention of violating Belgium's neutrality."

In the Reichstag on April 29, 1913, Herr von Jagow, secretary of state for Foreign Affairs, declared: "The neutrality of Belgium is determined by international conventions and Germany is resolved to respect those conventions. In reply to questions from members of the Social Democratic party Herr von Jagow twice repeated this declaration.

On Sunday, Aug. 2, the German ambassador to Belgium again assured the Belgian Foreign Minister "of his personal opinion respecting the security with which we had a right to regard our eastern neighbors."

Later in the same day the German ambassador delivered his government's ultimatum, and on Wednesday, Aug. 4, at 6 o'clock in the morning Germany declared war on Belgium. That very day German troops crossed the boundary and at once the shooting of civilians, the sacking of houses, the burning of towns and the outraging of women began.

But in all Mr. Cobb's voluminous writings you will not find a line or a word to suggest that the Germans had no business to be in Belgium at all.

WHAT CONSTITUTE ATROCITIES?

Mr. Cobb in his earlier letters was voluble in asserting that he had not seen any evidences of atrocities in Belgium. He appears to have peculiar ideas about what constitute atrocities. In his latest article he tells us that he was in Dinant shortly after the massacre at that place. The Belgian government has made public an official account of this frightful performance by the German troops and its version is confirmed, in almost every particular, by the story of the massacre published in the Telegraaf of Amsterdam based upon information supplied by a Dutchman, an eyewitness of what he described. This is the account published by the Telegraaf:

"He (the Telegraaf's informant) states that after the French evacuated the citadel, the Germans on entering the town took 153 burghers, intending to shoot them. During the next few days they killed in the town of Dinant and the villages of Anseremme, Leffe, and Neffe over 800 citizens, including many women and children, on the pretext that the civil population had fired on them. This pretext, according to the narrator, was not true. It was not the people who fired on the Germans, but the French, who were on the other side of the river.

"Describing the slaughter in Parade square, the narrator says that the women were separated from the men, the latter being placed on one side of the square and the women and children on the other side. The firing part placed between them was ordered to fire. After a scene of heartrending agony, during which the women and children knelt before the officers, 153 victims fell writhing in a welter of blood. Two men who fell unhurt and four others who were slightly wounded pretended to be dead. The officer said: 'Those able to rise must stand as the soldiers will not fire again.' The six men mentioned arose. The officer ordered another volley and the men fell. The officer then ordered the machine gunners to fire for some time on the bodies. The women and children were present all this time and were rendered distracted by grief and terror. The officer was unmoved and said in bad French, 'Mesdames, I've done my duty.'

"Meanwhile the pillaging of the town had begun. The Germans possessed most modern implements and appliances for opening safes, and they employed also chemical means for that purpose. A banker and his son who refused to say where the safes were, were shot. The plundering did not cease with houses—men in the street were searched for money.

"M. Poncelet, one of the most respected merchants in Dinant, fled with his wife and six children. They were overtaken. An officer ordered him to be shot, and on a soldier refusing to shoot, the officer shot Poncelet with his revolver. M. Himers was killed in similar circumstances at Neffe under the eyes of his wife. He was the owner of a factory and Consul of the Argentine Republic. His wife offered the officer a million of francs to spare her husband, but it was refused.

"Other atrocities are related. The soldiers who committed them were replaced later by the First Landstrum Infantry Battalion of Dresden under Commandant Beeger, and a period of relative tranquility ensued. Permission to re-inter the bodies was obtained, and they were all identified. The narrator made a list of 800. Of 1,500 houses only 300 are standing."

It would be interesting if Mr. Cobb would tell the world what is his idea of an atrocity.

"INFLEXIBLE CODE OF GERMANY."

Mr. Cobb admits that between 400 and 900 civilian inhabitants of Dinant and the neighborhood lost their lives. But they were not murdered—oh, no! they were "killed for offences against the inflexible code set up by the Germans." Some German officer doubtless told him this, at some stage of a three-course meal—they seem to have fed Mr. Cobb rather well—and he at once absolved them from the charge of having been guilty of an atrocity. It was, of course, very sad, very pitiful, very tragic—but the German officers and men who were responsible. It was merely a regrettable incident of the war, which in its turn had happened fortuitously, as if predestined from the dawn of time.

The Belgian official account, the version quoted above, and the earliest story of the massacre, which reached the world by way of Ostend, all agree that the firing from the heights across the river, which aroused the blood-lust of the Germans, was by the retreating French and not by civilians.

Further, if there had been a measure of resistance by the civilians this would not have justified these wholesale murders by the Germans. Mr. Cobb may be surprised to learn that military leaders—not even those demigods, the German officers—can frame "an inflexible code of war" and impose it at will without escaping the responsibility for their acts. The rules of war are fixed by custom. They represent the evolution of centuries and in their present form reflect the humanitarian tendencies of current civilization. Many of them have been expressly defined in The Hague conventions. The Germans have torn up these conventions, to which they were themselves parties, and have drafted their own rules of warfare based upon a revival of the methods of the Kaiser's great exemplar, Attila. Massacres and robberies may be authorized by these rules of war; but this does not excuse the Germans in the judgment of the civilized world—it merely confirms the opinion that as the result of the nation's worship of war and force, the German soldier has reverted into savagery.

A cardinal principle of modern war is the protection of the life and property of the non-combatant. The taking of hostages, the levying of war indemnities, the looting of banks, the sacking of private houses, the shooting of innocent civilians for the sins of their neighbors, for the purpose of terrorizing the community are all acts of savage warfare. The German authorities adopted these methods deliberately in furtherance of certain ends—chief of which was the spreading of the terror of the German name, thus, as they hoped, limiting the resistance they would meet and hastening the complete submission of the people destined to be conquered and incorporated within the Empire. As the German authorities in Berlin admitted by an official announcement in September a policy of "frightfulness" was deliberately entered upon for purposes of intimidation. There is no lack of other official evidence that the Belgian atrocities were part of a settled plan.

POLICY OF WHOLESALE MURDER.

Here, for example, is an extract from the notice posted in Hazeit on August 17th: "In the case of civilians shooting on the German army, a third of the male population will be shot." In a proclamation signed by Prince von Buelow himself, the General, commanding-in-chief, says: "It was with my consent that the General had the whole place (Andenes) burned down and about 100 people shot." In demanding a war levy of £120,000 from the Burgomaster of Wavre, von Buelow instructed General von Nieber to say in his letter: "The town of Wavre will be set on fire and destroyed if the payment is not made when due: without distinction of persons, the innocent will suffer with the guilty." These are rules of the "inflexible code" which Mr. Cobb accepts as sufficient justification for the actions of the German soldiery.

The policy of wholesale murder, as a means to rapid and easy conquest, appears to be implicit in the Prussian theory of war. Remarkable support of this view is given by some facts made public in the London Outlook of Dec. 12, by Prof. M. A. Gerothwohl. Prof. Gerothwohl gives quotations from a secret report—copies of which he says are in the possession of the Swiss Government—made by the German general-staff, providing for the sudden conquest of Switzerland as a preliminary to the invasion of France. It is pointed out in this secret document that "Switzerland being a hilly country the action of franc-tireurs would be particularly dangerous to the progress of our troops and convoys." Therefore, the draft-scheme emphasized "the necessity to punish, with the fullest rigor any breach of the peace by the population, which would have to be kept quiet by wholesale executions." In another paragraph it is stated: "The Swiss being excellent marksmen the greatest care should be taken to disarm the population. Every inhabitant found in possession of a rifle must be shot, irrespective of age or sex, and the house razed to the ground. The hostages of the particular town and village where he resides must be dealt with in the same way."

This was the treatment, carefully arranged in advance for the people of a country whose neutrality, like that of Belgium, had been guaranteed by the powers. The German plan for the conquest of Switzerland provided for the co-operation of an Italian army from the south; and apparently it was the refusal of Italy to support Germany that saved Switzerland from the application of that "inflexible code of war" which has turned Belgium into a desert and a cemetery.

The explanation of the calculated blood-thirstiness and savagery of the German methods of war is psychological. They are the fruit of the inordinate, incredible conceit of the German people due to their military conquests and their commercial triumphs. They have got themselves into a state of mind in which they consider themselves the Chosen People, whose Will should be Law throughout the world, whose Might is Right. All other nations are rotten, decadent, inferior peoples, whose destiny it is to be conquered by the German sword and then disciplined by Germanic "kultur." It never occurred to the German, in preparing for this war that any of these "lesser breeds without the law," could do more than offer a desperate but hopeless resistance to their plans of conquest and assimilation. They came to regard them in the light of rebels against the divine right of Kaiser Wilhelm to rule the world; and it was, therefore, the Kaiser's right to make such rules as seemed to him proper for their subjection. Indeed by some curious kink in the Germanic mind they developed the view that the more savage they were, the more merciful they were, since the sooner would the rebellious peoples be subdued to a meek acquiescence in their fate. This view is indeed openly expressed by a German officer in Mr. Cobb's latest article; and it is apparently accepted by that guileless and worshipful person as a completely satisfactory explanation of everything that has happened.

THE PENALTY FOR BARBARISM.

Germany's promulgation of these barbaric rules of war was based upon her belief that in this war it was her function to make rules and the duty of the opposing nations to obey them. If the Germans had deemed it possible that the war could be carried into German territory, that East Prussia, Silesia, Westphalia and the Rhine Provinces might, before they would not have been so ready to throw over those safeguards for private property and the lives of non-combatants that are afforded by the recognized rules of modern warfare. There will be widespread panic in Germany when the tide of war turns and sets in slowly, steadily and remorselessly towards Berlin. They will fear lest the measure they meted to the Belgians shall in turn be meted to them. And it will, beyond doubt, be a difficult matter for the Allied commanders to restrain their soldiers from exacting exemplary vengeance. In the interests of civilization it is highly necessary, however, that the Allied nations should refuse to descend to the levels set by Germany—the effect of which would be to barbarize Europe for a century.

But however strictly the Allied nations may adhere to those laws of humanity which tend to mitigate the horrors of war, Germany will pay to the uttermost for her crimes. The mills of the gods are grinding, grinding. So far from her methods intimidating the world, Germany has called into the field against her the moral forces of the universe, and they will be represented on the fields of battle by millions of fighting men. In the shock of battle, in the deadly bayonet charge, in the desperate test of physical strength and moral courage, the memories of burning towns and slaughtered innocents will give the little more that will mean victory. For every murdered civilian Germany shall pay with a thousand of her sons. Her soil shall re-echo the tread of conquering armies. She shall drink the cup of defeat and humiliation to the dregs.

Nor will the penalty cease with the war. What will the word "German" connote for the next fifty years? Not the bespectacled scientist, nor the shrewd trader—but the barbaric Goth, red from the shambles, armed with the torch of the incendiary and the dagger of the assassin. And Emperor William will pass into history bracketed with Attila and Genghis Khan; with Alva and Tilly

HAD A BAD COLD
WITH PROLONGED COUGHING.
TRIED NEARLY EVERYTHING
FINALLY
DR. WOOD'S
CURED HIM.

Mr. Wallace H. Grange, Vancouver, B.C., writes: "During a cold spell here about the middle of last October (1913), I caught a cold which got worse despite all treatments I could obtain, until about November 22nd, a friend said, 'Why not try Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup?' Really, I had no faith in it at the time as I had tried nearly every other remedy I had heard of, to no avail, but I thought I would give this last remedy a trial. I purchased a 50 cent bottle, and in three days I was feeling a different man. My cold was so hard, and the coughing so prolonged, that vomiting occurred after a hard spell of coughing. I carried the bottle in my pocket, and every time I was seized with a coughing spell I would take a small dose. I can most heartily recommend Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup to anyone with a severe cold, as its powers are most marvelous, and I never intend being without it at all times."

When you ask for "Dr. Wood's" see that you get what you ask for. It is put up in a yellow wrapper; three pine trees the trade mark; the price, 25c and 50; manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

DRY IRRITATING HACK OF BRONCHITIS INSTANTLY RELIEVED BY "CATARRHOZONE"

Catarrhozone can't fail to cure Bronchitis; it's so healing, soothing and balsamic that every trace of the disease flies before it. When you inhale the pure piney vapor of Catarrhozone, you send healing medication to the spots that are diseased and sore.

Isn't it rational to apply medicine where the disease exists? Certainly! and that's why Catarrhozone is so successful; it goes where the trouble really is, gets where a spray or ointment can't penetrate. For the relief and complete cure of bronchitis, asthma, catarrh, throat trouble, we guarantee Catarrhozone in every case. You don't take medicine—you don't take drowsy drugs—just breathe the balsamic essence of Catarrhozone; it does the rest safely and surely.

"For three years I was seriously bothered by a bronchial cough. At night I would awaken with a dry irritable feeling in my throat. I couldn't cough up anything, but very soon coughed my throat into quite an inflamed condition. Once I got Catarrhozone Inhaler I was all right. I took it to bed, and if an attack awakened me a few minutes' use of the inhaler gave me relief. Catarrhozone has cured me and I strongly urge everyone with a weak throat to use it regularly.

FARM AND GARDEN

CONSERVING SOIL PLANT FOOD.

A reader sends in the following, after having read the article which recently appeared showing that time is an excellent agent for rendering inert soil potash available:

Potash is one of the three elements most essential to plant growth. Practically all soils suitable for farming contain potash in available and also in unavailable form. As plant life takes potash only to the extent of its needs, if there is any excess in the soil it will remain until used, as potash does not leach out of the ground. Fortunately, many farmers have been using potash in increased amounts each year, so that the soil is better supplied with available potash than was the case a few years ago, and there probably remains in the soil a supply which has not been assimilated by the crops.

The problem of the individual farmer is to conserve his potash, which can be done in the following ways:

Green manuring, or turning under a cover crop.

Dressing heavily with barnyard manure.

Some authorities claim that nitrate of soda will do more than any other agent to render soil potash available. The potash that can be made available in the soil is usually in the form of hydrated silicate of potash and alumina and renders the potash available. As the amount of potash which can be made available in any soil is quite limited, the process of freeing it is only a temporary measure to meet an emergency, and it must eventually be replaced. Every 100 pounds of nitrate of soda will split off 50 to 55 pounds of actual potash (K2O) and assure successful crops for a time where no additional potash is used.

Organic ammoniates, such as blood, cottonseed meal, etc., will not render soil potash available, and in the absence of potash nitrate of soda should be used as the sole source of nitrogen or ammonia in all formulas up to and including 3 per cent.

FEEDING YOUNG PIGS.

After the weaning period has been passed safely there are still many responsibilities for the swine breeder to meet. A reasonably safe rule in feeding is to allow the young shoats every ounce they will eat, providing the ration is a reasonably well balanced one. An abundance of skim milk is a valuable help at this time, as it is, in fact, at all stages of the pig's development. Forage crops will also assist materially in the finishing process. Besides promoting good health in the shoats, gains made on forage are attained at 20 to 30 per cent. less expense than similar increases on grain alone. Clover and alfalfa are excellent forage crops for swine, because of their palatability and ready adaptability to rotations. Rape and rye furnish good cheap forage.

Besides the matter of proper feeding of the spring pigs, there are some other matters that must receive due attention if the pigs are to thrive. During the hot weather shade and an abundance of drinking water are very essential. Water must be given four or five times a day. Much labor can be avoided if a tank or trough is arranged for water to run into from the stock tank. The pigs can then help themselves to a drink at will, and on warm days one or more will be at trough drinking nearly all the time. This practice of keeping a constant supply of water before growing pigs will add 20 or 30 lbs. to each one's growth during the summer and fall.

BUTTER MAKING.

1. Cool the cream from the separator as soon as possible to 55 degrees F. or lower.
2. Never mix warm cream with cool cream.
3. Mix all the cream to be churned in one vat or can at least 18 hours before churning.
4. Ripen at a temperature of 70 to 75 degrees F. from six to eight hours, stirring frequently during this period.
5. Cool cream to churning temperature as soon as ripe.
6. Let cream stand eight hours or more (over night) at the churning temperature.
7. The temperature of churning should be such as to make the butter come in from 35 to 40 minutes, usually 55 to 60 degrees F.
8. If it is desired to use artificial coloring, it should be added to the cream just before churning.
9. Stop churning when the granules are about the size of peas, varying to wheat, and draw off the buttermilk.
10. Wash the butter once with pure water at the churning temperature, agitating three or four times, and drain.
11. Wash a second time with water about four degrees above churning temperature, agitating seven or eight times, and drain.
12. Add the salt wet while the butter is in granular form, using about one to one and one-half ounces for each pound of butter, according to the demands of the market.
13. Work the butter just enough to distribute the salt evenly.
14. If the butter is to go on the market it should be put up in neat, attractive packages.

NOTES.

A good as well as cheap axle grease can be made as follows: Mix one pound of black lead with four pounds of lard. Have the lead very fine and free from lumps of grit. Mix with the lard, then heat until melted and stir until cold. A little melted tallow or wax may be added to the hot mixture to make it stiffer when cold.

At the approach of winter the asparagus bed should be mulched at least four inches deep with well-rotted measure. This should be spaded in each spring. Salt is good also, and can be used at the rate of two pounds to the square yard. Brine from pork is good, too.

Alfalfa is an excellent crop for soiling purposes. Theoretically, it could be used the entire season, but practically this does not work. If it is cut too early it is apt to affect seriously the succeeding crop. This fact limits the time it can be fed to about one week at each cutting. It can be pastured for the entire season, but this kills it out and should not be done unless it is to be plowed up the following season.

From France comes the information that good results have been obtained from the use of sugar to overcome the great fatigue in horses when overworked. The good results obtained by a veterinary surgeon from the use of sugar in large doses in forced marches led him to employ it for the purposes of overcoming fatigue. Two hundred grains of sugar were fed daily, mixed with the horses's food and distributed regularly throughout the day.

The calf that gets a good drink of water every day, no matter if he has all the milk he needs, will do better than one which is deprived of this same means of quenching his thirst.

MISUSE OF NATIONAL NAMES

"Indignant Scot" Takes Up the Old Story of Use of "English."

(Montreal News)

"A Ballantrae" writes to The Evening News" once again protesting against the constant use of the word "English" in the war despatches when the word should be "British" and in support of his protest sends the following from the Weekly Scotsman, of Edinburgh, which we republish with pleasure:

Like "A Loyal Scot," London, I have lived in the South of England for a number of years, and experienced the same annoyance caused by the use of the words "England and English" for Britain and Britain. They are constantly in use both in the Press and on the lips of the man in the street. Indeed, English boys and girls are thus taught in the schools, and little else can be expected of them.

How is the wrong to be righted? Well, it might be in many ways, some of them very drastic, but, until the milder efforts fail, I need not mention them, nor advocate their application.

One way I suggest for the consideration of the Scottish people is this—make absolutely sure that no one but a patriotic Scotsman represents you in the British Parliament, one who is pledged to at all times and under all circumstances bring the attention of the powers that be to this disregard of the Treaty of Union. The common people here know no better but have some hazy notions that Scotland was conquered, that all the inhabitants wear kilts, sleep in beds built into the wall, and drink whiskey. The Scottish Press might well set the heather on fire, and in a thousand-and-one ways contribute to the utter extinction of this objectionable practice. The fault is entirely that of the people and the Press of Scotland, coupled with an anglicised nobility, who prefer London to Edinburgh; but if the two former would arise in the land, and England would soon learn that Scotland is not England, and never will be even in name.

I enclose a few verses on this subject, suggested entirely by the misuse of national names that I have witnessed since the war began:—

STILL "ENGLAND."

The "English Navy, in its might,
Is out upon the main;
The "English" Army—some in kilts—
Is at the front again.
The dogs of war are loosened
And gathered to the fray,
But the British ships and British troops—
I wonder where are they?

'Twas "England" that declared the war,
And "she" will see it through—
How kind she is to Britain,
Doing all there is to do—
We Scots and Irish do not count,
We're nothing in the scale;
I wonder, if the Scotsmen fled,
Would "England" have turned tail?

"England" will stand by Belgium,
And France and Russia, too;
But "English" papers never say
What Britain means to do.
For "treaty obligations"
We are told that "England" fights,
Yet our country's name is Britain,
As all know, by treaty rights.

To treaty obligations
We Scots have aye been true,
And over every clime on earth
Fought for the red, the white, and blue,
Still Englishmen continue
And it's to their lasting shame—
To speak and write of Britain
Falsely under "England's" name.

When blood has flowed like water,
And, 'midst the heaps of slain,
The Brawny Scot and stalwart Celt,
Who victory help to gain,
The glory will be "England's"
Like every other thing—
'Tis "England" this and "English" that,
Flag, Navy, Army, King.

Still, let Scots do their duty
In Britain's day of war;
A greater cause than "England's"
Nerves Scottish hearts by far.
For Britain and the Empire
We Scotsmen draw the sword;
And not like hired mercenaries,
As if "England" was our lord.

The HouseKeeper

To make the task of ironing easier dissolve a small piece of white laundry wax (the size of a small lump of sugar) in the hot starch. Before ironing, sprinkle the clothes with hot water. The iron will run smooth and the clothes will have a delicate gloss.

To clean velvet, stretch it out, pile upward, over a basin of boiling water. As the steam rises through the velvet have a second person brush it briskly with a clean brush.

To keep suet, take out any skin there may be and then put the suet in a sauce pan and place it on a warm but not hot fire, and let it melt gradually. When quite melted pour it into a pan of cold water. When quite hard, wipe it dry, wrap it in white paper, and when wanted for use it may be rubbed on a grater.

If moths are in a carpet, spread a damp towel over the part and iron it dry with a hot iron. The heat and steam will kill the worms and eggs.

If a calendar seems too pretty to destroy, paste a piece of sandpaper over the calendar pad and use it as a match scratcher.

One of the best acids for cleaning fingernails is lemon juice—a dessert spoonful of the juice to a cup full of warm water. This will remove stains.

Poultices of wormwood, hops or tansy are good for sprains.

To frost a bathroom window, dissolve Epsom salts in vinegar, making as strong a solution as possible. Apply this to the inside of the window panes with a brush and when dry give it a coat of white varnish.

A MOTHER'S ANXIETY

Most mothers are anxious when their little ones are teething, for at this time the baby's stomach gets disordered and there is a grave danger of convulsions. This anxiety can be lessened, however, if the mother keeps a supply of Baby's Own Tablets in the house and gives an occasional dose to her teething baby. The Tablets are the very best medicine in the world during the teething time. They regulate the bowels, sweeten the stomach, promote healthful sleep and make teething painless. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE GERMAN POTASH MENACE.

What are the gardeners and farmers going to do without potash? Practically all of it came from Germany and the supply is cut off; the little there is in the country being held at prohibitive prices and import having ceased. The German Potash Trust, which has in the past handled the Canadian supply, has closed its doors, and it will probably be some time before it resumes activity. War has also interfered with the importation of bone, nitrate of soda, sulphite of ammonia and basic slag, causing rapid increases in prices. This is a serious question that agriculturists have to solve or have solved for them. Something must be done to free Canada from dependance upon this German Government controlled trust. It is all very well to say, farmers must plow deeper, look more carefully after drainage, take care in turning under vegetable matter and give more frequent cultivation. Careful tillage and the best farming practice are desirable at all times and such methods restore certain necessary constituents to the soil, but they mean time and money; they make plant food in the soil more available and to some extent take the place of certain elements of the necessary fertilizer, nevertheless the question will not down.

While other forms of fertilizer are available, such as nitrogen, in the form of dried blood and fish, cyanide, and very important phosphate, Canada must have potash. Formerly in Ontario there were a number of phosphate mines, operated in the counties of Leeds and Frontenac, notably in Crosby, near the new line of the Canadian Northern and it is to be hoped that this industry will be revived by present conditions. It must be pointed out, however, that no one fertilizer ingredient can be substituted for another and most of our soils need more or less potash to give the best results.

From time to time reports of the discovery of potash in Canada has been received, but so far nothing of economic value has been found apart from the contents of Feldspar, which has not received the attention it should, and the Kelp, which is found in groves along the Pacific coast.

The recently reported discovery of potash along the line of the Canadian Northern Railway in Saskatchewan draws attention to the fact that for a number of years, German interests have kept a close watch on all such prospects and have traced up every case where potash discoveries have been reported in order that they may be in a position to secure such deposits and retain control of the world's potash supply. If such an attempt is made in the event of these Saskatchewan discoveries proving valuable, action should be taken to prevent it.

It is probably in the vast deposits of Feldspar that the salvation of the tiller of the soil lies. W. H. Smith, M.E., recently pointed out that along the Central Ontario are found large bodies of Orthoclase and Microline Feldspar with high potash contents. Consumers of potash salts must now turn their attention to the utilization of this Feldspar. Once this business is established it will in all probability become permanent.

Present conditions show how very necessary it is that Canada should have an independant source of supply. Practical methods have been worked out for the handling of feldspar for the recovery of both potash and fertilizing salts, also alumina, a most profitable by-product that is rising in price, which should prove an additional incentive to capital to take up the all important question of providing the Canadian market with a steady and reliable supply of potash at a reasonable price.

THE POULTRY WORLD

GETTING EGGS IN WINTER.

There is no good reason why keepers of poultry should not receive a good supply of fresh eggs during the winter months, provided they apply essentials that must be adhered to from start to finish that the production of eggs demand and to keep on the beaten path of those poultry keepers who have and are making good. To most, starting in poultry, a chicken is a chicken, and given a fair amount of care will produce a good supply of eggs the year round. This is error number one. Good and bad strains are found in all poultry, and the balance on the proper side of the ledger will largely depend on whether the strain of fowls is good or bad at the start.

It is generally supposed that the leghorns are good layers, and yet in this breed there are many that are but indifferent producers under the best of care. Again, some strains which have been proper culled are producers of good-sized eggs and many of them, and this holds good in all breeds. Therefore, it is wise for the beginner to secure for his foundation only eggs for hatching, day-old chicks, or stock from breeders, known to possess stock of merit. This is the first step toward getting winter eggs.

The second error of many is the failure to properly grow the stock, and many good breeders have been blamed for poor results when the fault lies at the door of the beginner, who naturally without much experience did not follow the known methods of successful rearing of the stock. Each check the chicks received during their period of growth from shell to maturity retards the egg production. Pullets, to come to fall lay at the proper age of the breed, must be properly grown, and while this means strict adherence to many small details, nevertheless all can easily be accomplished by anyone if carefully watched and the plans laid out strictly followed. Some of them are proper brooding, either natural or artificial, avoiding crowding by having plenty of brooder and house capacity, separating males from females at an early age, and growing the pullets in well ventilated poultry quarters during the summer months, without undue crowding them by having too many in one house. Overcrowding, indulged in by so many, is one of the worst features. Clean water and good feed are wasted if this evil is allowed.

Error No. 3 is hatching too late, winter coming on before the pullets are properly developed, although to the eye of the beginner they may look to be of size and ready to lay, but they do not lay until winter is past and the price of eggs lowers. The proper house is essential. It need not be expensive, but it must be well ventilated, and with room enough to properly quarter the flock without crowding. From three or four square feet of floor space should be allowed each hen for best results. There are many experienced poultry keepers who use less. The beginner should remember that he cannot always accomplish the same results at the start that the more experienced poultry keeper attains.

There is in the feed question as yet no perfectly balanced ration. Although much advanced knowledge has been gained from the practical poultry keepers of this country and by the aid of the experiment stations, a foundation, a solid one, has been laid, which each year the poultry keeper can improve on, and the well-known mixtures known by all up-to-date poultry keepers can be used with good results. Too much knowledge of feeding by the beginner has been harmful. Forcing feeds should be sidetracked. Too many pullets ready to lay under safe and sane feeding have been put back by the sudden change of feeds, whereas, if the beginner had let well enough alone, been less hasty, the flock would have come into steady laying on the regular ration. But in the eagerness for eggs, sudden changes of feeds, especially the so-called hen forcing feeds, put the pullets off their feet.

The feed that will grow a chick and keep the flock growing will make an egg, and until the beginner has solved the feed question for himself and proven it to be better than the so-called safe and sane feeding method he had better let well enough alone. A safe mixture for dry mash feeding, all other things being equal, is 200 bran, 100 middling, 100 ground oats, 100 mealed alfalfa and 15 per cent. of high-grade beef scraps. For Leghorns 20 per cent. of beef scraps can be used.

While poultry enjoys a variety of grains, good results can be obtained from the staple grains, such as corn, wheat and oats, green feed in the form of beets, cabbage or sprouted oats, will keep the fowls in good condition. Clean poultry quarters with clean, dry litter to promote exercise, fowls of the proper age, grown properly, and from good, strong stock, will produce eggs for anyone.

NOTES.

The up-to-date poultry raiser is now getting a good egg yield from his flock. The poultry keeper who has made many mistakes is facing a feed bill that will keep him awake at night. Many will realize the mistake of late hatched fowls this winter. Especially will this hold true with the beginners who cannot compete in the art of raising poultry with the poultry keeper of some years' experience.

One by one the advocates of the egg type are catching a broadside from the experienced poultry raiser. Now comes G. W. Weed, a life-time breeder, one of the old guard who has forgotten more than some have learned, who states in The American Fancier and Stock Keeper:

"One of the supposed strongest arguments in favor of the so-called egg type is to cite a good dairy cow. Of course, everyone at all posted in dairy pursuits knows that certain types of cows will produce more milk than others and an attempt to apply the same rules to the hen. Now, let us see, the production of eggs is simply the endeavor to reproduce their own species, or the production of young, and milk is something to sustain young. It may be that I am dense, but I cannot see them in a parallel sense, and after many years of experience I can say that the shape of the hen has but little to do with their egg-producing qualities. I would put health before everything, not only in the specimen itself, but in its ancestors. That, together with the proper environment, care and feed, will give good eggs. Then, too, you want to select, for even with everything the same, some will surely lay more than others, and I think that egg-producing qualities are surely transmitted."

The pullets ready to lay should now be quartered in the poultry buildings that they will occupy for the winter, giving each fowl from three to four square feet floor space. They will do better work when not crowded. Most poultry beginners crowd their flocks with the final results of poor production.

What is probably the largest egg record ever made in 365 days by any kind of fowl was recently completed by an Indian runner duck owned by John Slade, Malvern, Pa. According to a certificated record this duck laid 358 eggs in 365 days. In other words there were only seven days in the entire year that this duck did not produce an egg.

Fate.

We shall be born the whole wide world apart;
And speak in different tongues and have no thought
Each of the other's being, and no heed;
And these o'er unknown seas to unknown lands
Shall cross, escaping wreck, defying death;
And all unconsciously shape every act
And bend each wandering step to this one end—
That, one day, out of darkness, they shall meet
And read life's meaning in each other's eyes.
And two shall walk some narrow way of life
So nearly side by side that should one turn
Ever so little space to left or right
They needs must stand acknowledged face to face.
And yet, with wistful eyes that never meet,
With groping hands that never clasp, and lips
Calling in vain to ears that never hear
They seek each other all their weary days,
And die unsatisfied—and this is Fate!

Irony.

One summer day, I went my way,
And brought me to a stop
Right straight before the open door
Of an ironmonger's shop.

And, at a whim, I said to him:
"Oh, ironmonger, dear,
Tell me, I pray, why do you stay
Monging your irons here?"

"Well, well, you see," he said to me,
"I mong my irons, for when
I've mong a lot, much coin I've got
To pay my debt to men."

"Oh, then," I said, "the while you ply
Your ironmonger's trade,
For ample fee, pray mong to me
The best iron you have made."

"The iron you seek I mong last week,"
"He said; "but more I'll get."
I hope that dear ironmonger queer
His iron is monging yet.

ACHING BACK GETS QUICK RELIEF! ONE RUB WITH "NERVILINE" CURES

Every Bit of Stiffness and Soreness Goes When "Nerviline" Is Used.

Pain in back or side is awful hard to reach. Deep in the tissue is a congested or strained muscle. It is a long way for a liniment to go. Liniments you have used have not reached it, and the pain bothers you, whether moving or lying down.

What a pity you haven't tried Nerviline! Penetrating, you ask? Yes, and powerful, too. Nerviline strikes in far deeper than any application you have ever used. You might pay a dollar, ten dollars, a hundred, for that matter, but you could not equal Nerviline, either in strength, quickness of action, or permanency of relief.

If you think this too much to say for Nerviline, try it and be convinced.

Nerviline is sold by druggists everywhere, 25 cents or 50 cents a bottle, or direct from The Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

"For the Safety of the Boys"

The following is from the pen of the mother of Sergt. J. H. Routledge, a reservist, who before being called home for service, was employed with F. W. Fearman Co., of this city. The poem was written by his mother in Hamilton, and sent by Sergt. Routledge as a Christmas remembrance to Walter Talbot, engineer of the Fearman Company, and other friends here. It is entitled "For the Safety of the Boys."

God bless our noble band,
Bound for the Motherland,
God bless our boys!
In Britain's trying hour,
Proving themselves a tower,
Of strength, a mighty power,
God bless our boys!

On land and ocean wave,
Protect them, good and brave,
God bless our boys!
From tempest, fire and foe,
Protect them as they go,
Banish fear—care and woe,
God bless our boys!

O Father, bring to nought,
All ill the foe hath wrought,
God bless our boys!
From hidden mines at sea,
From berg and storm keep free,
Safe let their transport be,
God bless our boys!

United heart and hand,
Firmly and nobly stand,
God bless our boys!
Long to uphold the right,
Prove valiant in the fight,
Trusting in God for might,
God bless our boys!

When cannons loudly roar,
And terrors o'er them soar,
God bless our boys!
Pressed by the enemy,
May they defended by,
And find their shield in Thee,
God bless our boys!

GERMAN VS. BRITISH.

Showing the Vast Difference Between the Officers.

Many of the German wounded, it is reported, are suffering from small wounds in the back, believed to be the result of genial prods from their officers designed to keep them up to their work. An amusing story told by Sir Evelyn Wood illustrates the different practice obtaining among British officers. The hero of this anecdote was Sir James Scarlett, who was in command at Aldershot in 1870. On one occasion at manœuvres he got so far in advance of his men that Sir Evelyn, then a young officer attached to his staff, felt moved to venture a respectful protest—though at first without any effect. The amusing sequel of the incident may be narrated in Sir Evelyn's own words. "Three times I respectfully pointed out that he was very far forward, to be rebuffed only with a curt expression beginning with an oath. On the third occasion he turned round and said, 'Young man, have I not ordered you twice to hold your tongue? I'd like to hold my sharpshooters, what the [illegible] is that to you?' Said I, respectfully, 'Ten thousand pardons, sir, but it is the enemy's line in retreat you have been leading for the last ten minutes.'" He was short-sighted, and did not wear glasses, so was unable to see the distinguishing mark, a sprig of heather worn in the shakos of the troops he was attacking. Modern conditions of warfare would hardly admit of the most intrepid leader repeating this exploit, but at Balaclava this same James Scarlett had led the Heavy Brigade, himself far in advance of its front line, against a force three times as large.

FIFTY YEARS OF PROGRESS

UNION BANK CLOSES A SUCCESSFUL YEAR.

Net Profits $712,000.00. Gains in Public Deposits, Current Loans, Note Circulation and Total Assets.

The shareholders of the Union Bank of Canada who attended the annual meeting held in Winnipeg on 6th of January, had no reason to feel disappointed over the report presented to them. The record showed that a half century of careful business had resulted in the building up of a strong reserve, the accumulation of assets totalling over $81,500,000, and in the establishing of the bank in a leading position among the banking institutions of the country.

Net profits for the year 1914 amounted to over $712,000.00 as compared with $750,000.00 for the previous year. This contraction of $38,000.00 in net profits was to be expected, owing to the world-wide business depression which included Canada in its sweep, and affected the earnings of all our banking institutions. Apart from this one decrease the general showing made by the bank was satisfactory, while a number of gains were registered. Note circulation showed an increase over the figures for 1913, while current loans in Canada, were $1,000,000.00 more than in 1913. Total assets are over $1,000,000.00 greater than in the previous year, and now stand at $81,[illegible].

The increase of $1,000,000.00 in current loans is rather exceptional and indicates that the bank has not been curtailing credit to its customers, but on the other hand has been doing its full share in catering to the financial needs of the communities in which its branches are located. At the same time that this generous policy was pursued, the bank was careful to maintain an unusually large proportion of its assets in quickly available form. The liquid assets amount to 24.30 per cent. of the bank's total liabilities to the public. Public confidence in the bank is further shown in the fact that public deposits show an increase of over $336,000.00 while the amount of bonds, debentures and stocks held by the bank shows an increase of $1,312,000.00.

With the $94,000.00 brought forward from the previous year added to the net earnings of $712,000.00 makes $806,000.00 available for distribution. Dividend requirements absorbed $450,000.00, the rate paid during the year being at the rate of 8 per cent. with a bonus of 1 per cent. The sum of $150,000.00 was set aside for depreciation in securities; contribution to Patriotic Fund absorbed $25,000.00, while the officers' pension fund amounted to $10,000.00, leaving a balance to be carried forward of $101,000.00.

The addresses of the President and General Manager were characterized by conservative optimism. They both took full recognition of the business depression which prevailed throughout Canada, and which affected the earnings of the bank, but at the same time expressed their confidence in the future of the country. President Galt pointed out that there was an increase in the land ready for crop next year, amounting to twenty per cent. and concluded his address with the statement that "Hard work, courage and intelligent economy will undoubtedly bring us safely through the present ordeal." Altogether the report presented at the annual meeting should prove satisfactory to the shareholders.

(By J. Hervey Hume.)

The fox trot is now generally conceded to be the most popular of the new ballroom dances. It may be described as a combination of the old "negro shuffle" and the more modern tangstep. Its variations are too numerous to mention. In fact, it may be said of the fox trot that any step which is done in unison with the fox trot music may be called fox trotting.

ADDITIONAL LOCALS

RAILWAYS MUST GIVE NOTICE

The Railway Commission has issued a ruling that in future when companies intend to make any change in passenger train service, announcement of such intention must be posted in ticket offices, stations and other public places ten days in advance. This is in addition to the announcements made and advertising now done by the companies. Coincident with the posting of this notice a circular addressed to agents and others concerned, giving a skeleton outline of the changes, shall be placed in the hands of all agents, and by them the information shall be given to the public.

PLAYS GOOD HOCKEY

In the report of a Junior O. H. A. game which was played at Woodstock on Monday night between the Hamilton Rowing Club and the Woodstock College, in which the latter was defeated by 5 to 3, in referring to the playing of Harry Wettlaufer, who is in the line-up of the Hamilton team, the London Advertiser says:—

> For Hamilton, it is hard to pick a star, as all the team were on their toes from start to finish, and the good use they made of their bodies in breaking up the fine combination work of the collegians was a revelation to local fans. But Wettlaufer, on right wing, was the star of the visitors. In the first twenty minutes the excitement was intense, the speed of both teams catching the fancy of the crowd. Reid and Wettlaufer played a nice game for the scullers, their rushing and combination being pretty. Swartzman and Ball played great hockey, the latter securing two tallies for his team, while Wettlaufer who is a brother of former President Wettlaufer of the O. H. A., did likewise for his team-mates.

KNOX CHURCH MEETING

The annual congregational meeting of Knox church was held on Wednesday evening of last week. The pastor Rev. Thos. Wilson, opened the meeting and Mr. W. A. Rowand was appointed chairman and Mr. D. McKechnie, secretary. Satisfactory reports were received from all branches of the church work.

The number on the Roll is 517, some of these are amongst the forces fighting for the Empire in the greatest war in the history of the world, causing the worshipers at Knox church to have a keen interest in their welfare.

The receipts for ordinary revenue was $3570.06 and the expenditure $1529.00. There are no liabilities. The contributions for colleges and missions was $2125.31 in addition the W. H. M. A., the newly amalgamated W. M. S., contributed $1100.00, of these amounts $1000.00 was a bequest from the late Mrs. Pinkerton, and $100.00 by an unknown giver in memory "Of Mother". One clause in the W. M. S. reports was:—The year 1914 will stand out as the beginning of an epoch in history such as few generations have known. God at this time is making himself manifest in a way that we hope will prove to the world "that it is not by might nor by power but by my Spirit saith the Lord", that man become truly great. This present conflagration among the different nations of the world will convince, that, national predominance, military and civil, cannot tyranize over the mental and spiritual refinement of the individual, which comes through the Christianizing influence of the Gospel.

The officers elected are:—Geo. McKay, Treas; H. M. Lay and R. J. Hawthorne, Auditors; Mgr. for 1 year term, F. Reuble, for 3 year terms. H. Pletsch, J. W. South, W. J. Richardson, J. H. Hunter, A. McLennan, and F Latchford. To vacancies in the Trustee Board, D. McKerracher and Wm. Kistler.

TAKEN TO HOSPITAL.

George Pike, a young recruit who came here from Allenford, to join the third contingent was taken to the hospital on Thursday last suffering from pneumonia. Pike was drilling with his comrades in the snow and apparently contracted a cold which developed into pneumonia. The attack however, was a light one and he is now recovering.

WATERWORKS IMPROVEMENTS

The Waterworks Committee of the town council intend making several improvements in the system during this year. At the council meeting on Monday evening, the tender of Wm McKillop of Brantford to drill an 8 inch 350-foot well at the pumping station was accepted. This well which will be drilled at once will cost in the neighborhood of $800 and if a good supply of water can be secured in this manner, a second well will immediately be sunk. Besides the drilling of this well, the proposed extension of the water main in the west ward will also be proceeded with.

WON ADVERTISER CUP

Pte. Bert Cartwright who is training with the second contingent at London spent Sunday with his friends here. Bert informed us that all the Walkerton boys are in good health and are enjoying life at London. "Base" Company of the Eighteenth Battalion of which all the local volunteers are members has won the Advertiser Cup for best marks in company drill. All companies put in a team and rivalry was keen, but the boys of Base Company proved the better soldiers, being 60 points ahead of the second high company. The Duke of Connaught presented the cups to the company on Saturday morning.

MOBILIZED AT GUELPH.

A despatch from Guelph which appeared in the daily paper on Tuesday says:—More than 800 members of the 30th Battalion third Canadian contingent, mobilized at Guelph today, the Winter Fair buildings being utilized for the purpose. The History of the County of Bruce

And of The

Minor Municipalities Therein

(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)

Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps, Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

DIED IN THE WEST

Word was received here last week of the death of Mrs. George Berscht, which occurred at Alsask, Sask., on Tuesday last. The deceased who was about fifty-five years of age, was well-known in Walkerton, Mr. Berscht, having conducted an implement agency here for some years.

CHURCH MEETING

The annual business meeting of the Baptist and Christian church was held on Friday evening. A good representation of the congregation gathered and listened to reports of the several branches of the work of the church all of which showed increases over those of the previous twelve months. The membership roll showed an increase of six. The total amount raised for all purposes was $1312 50. The Board of Management and Board of Deacons were reelected for another year. It was decided to adopt the duplex envelope system for current expenses and missions. Arrangements were also made to hold special services in the near future.

The remains were brought to Wiarton for interment. Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins being among those who attended the funeral.

AN EARLY SPRING?

If any faith can be placed in the legend of Candelmas Day, Feb. 2nd, we can without doubt look forward to an early spring. Tuesday last will be remembered as having been the stormiest day of this winter and at no time during the few hours of daylight was a shadow perceptible on the snow Therefore, Bruin, in his wanderings did not see his shadow and will not return to his lair for another six-weeks snooze, but will remain out to await the warm sunny days soon to come.

DIED IN CHESLEY

On Wednesday last, January 27th, Helen R. McGaw, wife of Mr. George Small, passed away at her home in Chesley, after a short illness, at the age of 41 years. Mrs. Small was for many years a resident of Walkerton and moved to Chesley to reside some three years ago. The deceased is survived by her husband and several children. The funeral took place to the Chesley cemetery on Saturday.

JUDGEMENT FOR PLAINTIFF

In the case of McGregor & Pritchard vs Schmidt, Judge Klein on Wednesday last gave a judgement in favor of the plaintiffs, which not only grants the injunction to compel Mr. Schmidt to trim the cherry trees which overhang the property of McGregor & Pritchard, but also awarded them $1.00 damages, the defendant to pay all costs in connection with the suit. This case attracted considerable attention among farmers and fruit-growers and the Judge's decision is importance to a large number of them.

TRAFFIC TIED UP

Monday night's storm which was accompanied by a record snow-fall was the most terrific experienced in this part of Canada for several winters. Some fifteen inches of snow fell, and this with a sixty-mile wind soon filled all cuttings on railroads and tied up the traffic. There were no trains on either roads during Tuesday or Wednesday morning. The first G. P. R. train nosed through on Wednesday afternoon and as the C.P.R. was cleared for traffic on Wednesday morning mails are once more being received regularly.

DEFEATED IN PORT ELGIN.

The Walkerton hockey team received their first taste of defeat this season in Port Elgin on Friday last when they emerged from a hard-fought conflict with the small end of a 9-5 score. The game was a strenuous one, featured by close checking and individual rushes and as the locals were at a disadvantage in the small ice-space, the lake-shore boys managed to put it over them. This win for Port puts them at the head of the district standing. The return game which was advertised to be played here on Tuesday, owing to the blockade on the G.T.R. was postponed for one day and is in progress as we go to press, (Wednesday night).

DEFEATED CHESLEY

The Walkerton High School hockey team did the "come back" stunt at the rink here on Friday evening when they defeated the fast Chesley High School by a score of 6-5. The game was a fairly good exhibition of hockey and the boys are deserving of better patronage, than which was extended to them on this occasion, the attendance being small. The half-time score was 3-3. The teams lined up:—

WHO WILL BE JUDGE?

The passing away of Judge Barrett has made vacant the senior judgeship of the County Court of the County of Bruce and the question arises, who will receive the appointment to the position made vacant by his death. Locally the impression prevails that Junior judge A. B. Klein will receive a promotion and a junior judge be appointed to take his place on the bench. Although this is not a certainty, this procedure would meet with the approval of not only the citizens of Walkerton and vicinity, but of the entire populace of Bruce County. In performing his judical duties in the past, Judge Klein has proven himself to be fairminded and careful in all his decisions and is most worthy of the appointment to the senior judgeship.

LEASED PROPERTY

Mrs. H. Tovell has leased the property of the late Mrs. Thulale on Victoria St., and will move there in the near future.

DROWNED AT MILDMAY

A mysterious drowning accident occured at Mildmay during Tuesday, the victim being Mr. Halpin Harper a well known resident of that village. The deceased left his home after having had breakfast on Tuesday and when he did not return for dinner or supper a search was instituted his body being found under the ice at Witter's pond on Wednesday morning The men were not cutting ice there that day and how he came to his death is a mystery. An inquest is being held, Coroner Dr. Porter, presiding. The late Mr. Harper was about fifty years old and is survived by a wife and child.

BRUCE'S GENEROSITY

As will be seen in the summary of proceedings at the January Session of the County Council, which appears in another column, Bruce County has made the contribution of one mill of the County tax rate to the Patriotic, Red Cross, and Belgian Relief Fund, which is equal to the sum of $30,000. One half of this amount will be contributed this year and the balance next year to be divided among the several Funds and paid out as set forth in the council minutes. This is a very generous gift on the part of Bruce, but the objects to which the contributions has been made are undeniably of a most worthy nature and the county council's proceeding in levying a tax rate of one mill for these causes will meet the approval of all from the smallest rate payer to the greatest.

MEETING OF CREDITORS.

In the matter of the assignment of Rose Pleskey of the town of Walkerton. A meeting of the creditors was held in Mr. Jas. Whitehead's office on Thursday Jan 28th, when the following statement was submitted to the creditors. Assets including stock on hand, fixtures, cash and book Debts amounting to about $17244,00 while the Liabilities as sworn to were about $15,983,79. Therefore it was moved by the Bank of Commerce seconded by A. J. Smith that Mr. Jas. Whitehead be retained as assignee. It was also moved by the Bank of Commerce seconded by Mr. Marks of Bradshaw & Co. that Inspectors be appointed to assist the assignee in disposing of the stock and the Inspectors named were H. M. Lay, A. J. Smith and Mr. Marks all of which was carried. It was also moved by Bank of Commerce seconded by Mr. Marks that the stock be sold in Toronto by public auction notice of which will be given later, carried.

BRANT COUNCIL DOINGS

The municipal council of the township of Brant are having some decidedly unpleasant things said about them and unseemly epitaphs hurled at them since their meeting on Monday. The only two important items of business to be transacted were manipulated in such a way as to instill anything but confidence in regard to municipal matters in the minds of the ratepayers of the municipality. The impression left on the average elector by the council's actions would be that the municipal affairs in Brant were this year going to be run by the three men from the north end, for the people of the north end exclusively. The first question brought up was that of the transference of the general account of the township from the bank of Commerce, Walkerton to the Royal Bank at Elmwood. Although Mr Lay who was present, made a very good proposition to the council, when Mr. Rowand moved that the motion carried at the last meeting, calling for the removal of the account to the Royal bank be rescinded, he did not secure a seconder and consequently the decision of the council still stands. The legality of this on the part of the council is questioned as some years ago a by-law was passed providing that the township business should be done with two separate banks. The bridge fund in one and the general account in the other. This by-law will also have to be rescinded before the proposed change can be affected. The main reason given by the councillors for this change of banks was that the Royal bank at Elmwood pays taxes to the township and should have the business, but this being the argument, in their next transaction they displayed glaring inconsistency in regard to municipal patriotism. It was the appointment of an assessor, for which position there were five applications as follows:— Syd. Parker, Geo. Fiddis, Jas. Ormiston, Jno. Connolly and Jack Beirworth of Bentick. Although the four residents of Brant have long paid taxes to the township treasurer they were passed by and when it was moved by Monto and seconded by Willoughby, that Mr. Bierworth who pays taxes in Bentick, be appointed assessor at the salary of $100, Mr. Findley said "agreed" and the reeve had no alternative but to mark the motion "Carried." The council have perhaps not yet struck their gait, but they will have some difficulty in explaining their actions on Monday to the satisfaction of many ratepayers.

A GOOD LECTURE.

The "Illustrated lecture on "The British Navy" which was given in the town hall on Wednesday last, by Mr. Herbert B. Ames, M. P. honorary secretary of the Canadian Patriotic Fund was will attended. Mr. Ames is an excellent speaker and his lecture which was of great educational value was listened to attentively by every-one present.

PRACTICAL PATRIOTISM.

A few days ago the Walkerton Electric Light and Power Company Ltd., placed in the hands of Mayor Lippert an offer to supply electric current to the extent of twenty horse-power for 23 hours per day free, while the war lasts, to any industry that would manufacture supplies for war purposes. The R. E. Truax Co., also offered free water power during the war to any company who will manufacture war materials in Walkerton. These are very liberal offers on the part of these companies and every endeavor is being made by the council and Board of Trade to take advantage of it. As our neighboring towns are getting orders for different lines of goods, why should Walkerton not be one of the lucky towns also? A joint meeting of the Board of Trade and Council was held on Monday evening with a view to taking steps to secure contracts for war materials and take advantage of these offers and a delegation consisting of Senator Donnelly, R. E. Truax, M. P., W. D. Cargill, M.P.P., W. H. Shaw and G. S. Schwindt, was appointed to go to Ottawa and Montreal and ascertain what goods the governments required that can be advantageously manufactured in Walkerton.

Dismissed His Deputy

There is trouble brewing in the ranks of the local Conservatives, the cause being the dismissal from office of the Deputy Registrar of Bruce, Mr. Geo. D. McKay, by his senior, Registrar McFarlane.

No political dodge has aroused so much public sentiment locally as has this uncalled for, unwarranted action on the part of Mr. McFarlane, which was carried out, like the deed of a thief in the night, under cover and in an underhanded manner.

Without giving notice to Mr. McKay, the registrar went to Toronto, had a new deputy Mr. McCallum, of Toronto, sworn in and on Saturday handed Mr. McKay his dismissal papers. Had the Deputy been an incompetent servant or been guilty of some misdemeanor great or small, there would have been a reason for Mr. McFarlane's procedure, but a more faithful and more obliging public official than Mr. McKay could not be found throughout the length and breadth of this province. During his twenty-three years' in office the latter has proven himself to be all that could be desired of any employee and his dismissal has come like a bolt from the blue to not only himself but his many friends.

It is a well-known fact that at the time the present registrar was appointed, Mr. McKay had an offer of an excellent position in Edmonton and took a trip West to look over the ground, but on his return several local legal men urged him to remain here until such a time as Mr. McFarlane should get into the swing of his new office. As the position at Edmonton was being held for him, this he consented to do not knowing how long it would be. But it will be remembered that after his appointment, Mr. McFarlane resided and conducted a store in Paisley for some time and the services of Mr. McKay, it was evident, were much needed by him, and in remaining here he lost his Edmonton position. During the heavy season, it is well-known by the legal profession that Mr. McKay has been doing the work of two men on account of not having sufficient competent help thus he saved Mr. McFarlane many dollars per year, and in engaging a cheaper man, as was his excuse for the change, the Registrar will be no farther ahead in the end.

To say the least Mr. McFarlane in dismissing Mr. McKay has rubbed against the grain of public opinion and both Liberal and Conservatives are clamoring loudly that Mr. McKay be reinstated and several prominent Conservatives have already written to the Department asking for this and protesting against the Registrar's conduct and we are looking for the axe to fall on the man higher up.

OBITUARY

WILLIAM BROCKELBANK.

Another of the old pioneers of Brant township passed away during the past week in the person of Mr. William Brockelbank who had reached the advanced age of 82 years. The funeral took place from his late residence, lot 13, concession 5, on Monday afternoon to the Walkerton cemetery.

MRS. A. ZUBER

On Friday last, after a lengthy illness from blood-poisoning, Elizabeth Zuber, wife of Mr. Anthony Zuber of the west ward, died at the Bruce County Hospital. The deceased, who was 47 years of age, is survived by her husband and several children who have the sympathy of many friends in their bereavement. The remains were interred in the Walkerton cemetery on Tuesday.

MRS. MARY HOLLING.

Mrs. Mary Holling, relict of the late Jno. Holling, died very suddenly on Monday morning at the home of Mrs. C. Rettlebron, with whom she has lived for many years. The deceased who was eighty years of age had been in her usual health, but was very feeble from old age and shortly after retiring to rest on Monday morning was found dead in her bed. The late Mrs. Holling was one of Walkerton's most respected old citizens. She was a clever needle-worker and right up to the day of her death was engaged in making fancy-work which was celebrated far and wide. The funeral which was private took place to the Walkerton cemetery yesterday afternoon.

MISS LOUISE PORTEOUS.

One of the most regrettable deaths which occurred in Walkerton for many months took place at the Bruce County Hospital on Sunday night, when Miss Louise Porteous passed away following a major operation for internal trouble. The late Miss Porteous had been in failing health, from an abscess of the stomach, for several months and as a last resort and in a final effort to save her life an operation was commenced on Saturday night. The doctors, however, found that an operation would be of no avail and she passed away at eleven p. m. Sunday. Miss Porteous was but 29 years of age and her death removes from social life one of Walkerton's most popular young women. She possessed a most jovial disposition which won for her the respect and friendship of all with whom she came in contact and her early demise is regretted and her death mourned by every acquaintance. The deceased has been a life-long resident of Walkerton, having conducted a millinery parlour during the past few years and the innumerable beautiful floral tributes which bedecked her coffin, showed in some degree, at least, the high esteem in which she was held. Besides her parents she is survived by one sister, Mrs. Devereau of Guelph. The funeral which was largely attended took place on Wednesday morning to the R. C. church, thence to the Walkerton cemetery.

JUDGE BARRETT

The flags on all government and municipal buildings in Walkerton were placed at half-mast on Thursday last as a last tribute to our esteemed citizen, Judge William Barrett, senior judge of the County of Bruce, who passed away at the Bruce County Hospital that afternoon. Judge Barrett had been in failing health for many months and underwent an operation at the hospital on January 20th. Although the operation was of a minor importance, the shock was too much for the judge's rundown system, the spark of life departing on Thursday afternoon. The judge, who was seventy-four years of age, besides his wife, is survived by one daughter, Mrs. C. F. Bate of Brampton, and three sons, Dr. Lawrie of Galt, Ethelbert of St. Paul, and Walter of New York. The funeral was held to the Walkerton cemetery on Saturday afternoon.

The late Judge Barrett began his law practice as a barrister in 1868. He was appointed junior judge of Bruce County in September, 1885, and became senior judge in April, 1893. Had he lived to remain on the bench for two more years he would then have been superannuated. He was a resident of Walkerton for more than forty years, having previously been in business in Durham. He was an excellent judge, well thought of all over the county. Never was there a more conscientious Judge than Mr. Barrett. He inspired instant respect and confidence. Suitors always knew that if all the facts could be adduced they would get justice tempered with leniency for offenders, unless the welfare of the public demanded severity. He was always interested in all public events, especially those affecting the County of Bruce. In the matter of sports he was an ardent fisherman. He had a summer home at Southampton, where he used to spend three months every year, doing his business from there. Last summer his health did not permit him to go there as usual, but a sojourn at Battle Creek brought him only temporary benefit.

TRUE TO HIS RACE

"No," answered Susy, with sudden energy. "'Let justice be done, though the heavens fall.' A guilty man had better die for his crime than an innocent one suffer the slightest unjust suspicion through him! What do you think, Lord Wellrose?" she enquired, turning to the earl, confident also of his answer.

"I agree with you perfectly; a falsely-accused man should clear himself at whatever cost to the real criminal," answered the earl.

"But if the falsely accused man should be quite alone in the world, the guilty man should have father and mother, brothers and sisters, who would be brought to shame and sorrow by his exposure and punishment, then would not the falsely accused be justified at least in keeping silence?" earnestly anquired Benny.

"By no means," emphatically answered the earl.

As he spoke the door was opened, a visitor was announced, and a lady, dressed with Quakerly simplicity in a gray gown, shawl and bonnet, entered the cell.

She bowed to the lady and gentleman present without recognizing either, and then advanced to speak to the young prisoner.

"Benjamin Hurst! how little you are changed except in growth! Benjamin, I should be so glad to meet you again, if it were anywhere else than here," she said, taking his hand and pressing it affectionately.

But the young prisoner gazed on her in dumb amazement.

"Why, Benny, you don't seem to know me at all! And I should have known you anywhere! Look at me, my boy. Don't you recognize me now?"

"Miss Rachel Wood!" exclaimed Benny, in joyful surprise, starting up as if he would have embraced her, then recollecting himself, blushing and sinking back on his seat, but adding in a more subdued manner: "Oh, I am so rejoiced to see you! It was so good of you to come! And, Miss Rachel, I want to tell you at once, I did not commit the murder for which I am to be tried."

"I do not believe you did, Benny! But I am glad to hear you say so, for all that," said Rachel, warmly.

"Ah, but he knows who did! And he is suffering innocently for the guilty, just as he did when he was a poor, friendless child!" said Susy, suddenly breaking into the conversation.

The quiet, Quakerly-looking woman turned with surprise to gaze upon the elegantly dressed young lady who had spoken to her.

"You do not recognize me, Miss Rachel. There is someone else besides Benny it seems who has a short memory for faces. I am Susy, and I am very glad to see you again," said the young lady, offering her hand.

"Suzy Juniper!" echoed Rachel Wood, in surprise, as she took the delicately gloved hand and held it while she gazed on the lively face of the young girl.

"Yes, Suzy Juniper! And now do you recognize me?" inquired Susy, smiling.

"Now I do. But I should scarcely have done so if you had not told me your name. You are more changed than Benjamin Hurst is," said the quiet, Quakerly woman, gazing on the lovely young creature before her.

"Externally I am. But not at heart, for I am so glad to see you, Miss Rachel! It is like old times. Are you not a little glad to see me, too?" inquired Suzy in a plaintive voice.

"Indeed I am, my dear, and greatly surprised," said Rachel Wood, taking the kiss that Suzy offered in the overflowing love of her faithful young heart.

"And the Earl of Wellrose? Surely, Miss Rachel, you know Lord Wellrose? He is one of the visitors of the duchess school, where you are the matron," said Suzy.

"I have the honor of some slight acquaintance with his lordship," said Rachel, returning the bow, "but the gentlemen visitors of the school have more to do with the teachers' department than with the matron's."

"Rachel!" broke in Suzy once more. "I began by telling you that Benjamin Hurst is doing now in his manhood precisely what he did fifteen years ago in his friendless childhood. He is shielding the guilty at the risk of his own life! Oh, Rachel, please unite with us in trying to persuade him to clear himself from the false imputation of this crime."

"Miss Rachel, I implore you, do not attempt to do so. Do not distress yourself or me by urging a course that I cannot pursue," entreated the young man.

"We must trust in Providence to the clearing up of this mystery. It is evident that Mr. Hurst will not clear himself at the expense of another, even when that other is the guilty party. Let us not pursue the discussion," said Lord Wellrose.

And soon after this the visitors departed, after having promised to return the next day.

Suzy went home and telegraphed, and then wrote to the manager of the Theatre Francaise to say that her brother and accredited agent, Mr. William Juniper, had left London for Paris on the third of the current month, to treat with him concerning an engagement for herself and troupe at the theatre; that she had been daily and hourly expecting to see him, or to hear from him on the subject of his mission; but up to the date of her letter she had neither seen nor heard from him; that she was suffering great anxiety on her brother's account; and she besought the manager to have inquiries set on foot in Paris, as she feared that her brother had met with foul play.

The manager wrote back by return mail to say that he had notified the Parisian police as to the disappearance of the missing young gentleman, and that he would write again to inform mademoiselle, as soon as anything should be ascertained on the subject.

But day after day passed and no news of William Juniper came from the other side of the channel, and Suzy's anxiety daily increased.

The term of her engagement at the Covent Garden Theatre expired, and she positively declined all overtures toward a re-engagement there, or a new engagement anywhere else.

The newspapers reported that Mademoiselle Ariella had abruptly left the stage, and left it forever; that she was suffering from a slight indisposition, and had retired only for a short season; that she had entirely lost her voice, and would never sing again; that she was about to start on a professional tour through the United States of America; that she was going to be married to a German grand duke; that she was going into a French convent to take the veil; that she had gone to the insane asylum.

Every rumor was inconsistent with every other.

And every new report contradicted the last preceding one.

Meanwhile Suzy lingered in London, living in strict retirement at her little palace in Park Lane, seeing no company but the Earl of Wellrose, and going nowhere but to Newgate to visit the poor prisoner there.

Benny bore his confinement with his usual patience and fortitude, and waited for the opening of the sessions at the Old Bailey.

A fortnight had passed in this way, when one morning an event occurred that changed the whole aspect of affairs so far as the young prisoner at Newgate was concerned.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Earl of Wellrose was sitting with Benny in his cell, and speaking words of comfort and encouragement to prepare him for his arraignment with cheerfulness and strength, when the door was suddenly thrown open, and Percy Mellias, accompanied by the governor of the jail and the high sheriff of the county, entered the cell. The faces of all three bore signs of unusual disturbance, though it seemed to be of a pleasant nature.

Lord Wellrose and Benjamin Hurst looked at them and at each other, expecting—they knew not what.

The three newcomers bowed to the earl and then Mr. Percy Mellias turned to Benny, and said, with some excitement:

"Mr. Hurst, you can bear trouble with great fortitude. Can you bear happiness as well?"

Benny looked at the questioner with surprise, and then, as a gleam of his old humor twinkled in his eyes, he answered:

"I don't know. The experiment has never been tried upon me."

"I think you can bear it, however," said the lawyer, with a smile. "Now listen, Mr. Hurst. And Lord Wellrose, you too, will be astonished! I am glad, however, that Miss Suzy is not here to-day. If she had been, our communication must have been deferred until her departure."

"It seems to me that you are taking unusual pains to prepare us for something," said Lord Wellrose, with a smile not devoid of curiosity.

"Yes, I am preparing you for something. Benjamin Hurst!" he said, turning to the prisoner, "we bring an order for your immediate discharge. You are entirely cleared from all imputation of guilt. You are a free man from this hour!"

"Thank God!" exclaimed the astonished and delighted prisoner, even without knowing or suspecting the cause of his deliverance. "Oh, thank God!"

And he burst into tears of joy and gratitude.

"Mr. Hurst, I am delighted," added Percy Mellias, warmly grasping and shaking the hand of the young man.

"I congratulate you with all my heart, though I do not, in the least, understand the turn affairs have taken. God bless you, Benjamin Hurst," said Lord Wellrose, earnestly shaking his hand.

"Thanks, thanks," said Benny, half choking with emotion.

The governor of the jail then begged permission to read the order for the prisoner's discharge, and he read it.

"But how came all this about?" enquired the earl.

"Let us get out of this place first, and then I will tell you. It is a strange story, not without its sorrow for some concerned, though in fact my pleasure at the vindication of my client here made me forget that. Come! I have a four-wheeled cab at the door. Come, Mr. Hurst. My lord, will you accompany us?"

"Certainly," said Lord Wellrose, rising.

They left the dark and gloomy prison and went out into the street, where the afternoon sun was shining brightly.

"We will drive to the Morley House and take a private parlor for an hour or two, if your lordship pleases?" said Mr. Mellias.

"Certainly," said the earl.

And they all entered a cab that was waiting before the door, and Mr. Mellias gave the order to drive to the Morley House.

When they arrived there Mr. Mellias, who acted for the little party, got out and engaged a private parlor, to which he ordered refreshments to be brought, and in which the three soon found themselves comfortably seated around a table, with a bottle of light wine and a plate of biscuits before them.

Here Mr. Percy Mellias told his strange story. It was in brief this:

That among the victims of the fatal accident on the Paris and Marseilles Railroad was William Juniper, who though not instantly killed, was fatally injured.

He had been dragged from beneath the ruins of a railway carriage, and conveyed in an insensible condition to the nearest house, where, for several days, he lingered in a state of coma.

Just before his death, as often happens in such cases, he came to his senses, and to the full consciousness of his condition.

His first act was then to ask for the attendance of a clergyman and a magistrate.

And in answer to his call the venerable cure of the parish and a notary from the village came to his bedside.

To them he made a full confession of the unintentional murder that he had committed, and that had driven him from his native country.

This confession was taken down from his lips in writing, and duly sworn to, signed, witnessed, sealed and despatched to the proper authorities in London.

It had arrived on that day. And the order for the release of Benjamin Hurst had been immediately sent to the sheriff and the governor of Newgate.

These two officers, glad to be the emissaries of deliverance to the prisoner, were on their way to his cell for the purpose of discharging him, when they were joined by Mr. Percy Mellias, who, ignorant of what had happened, had come for a last consultation with his client before the trial.

The sheriff told him of the pleasing nature of their errand, and he was of course, sincerely delighted with the turn affairs had taken.

So Mr. Percy Mellias had scarcely heard the good news two minutes before he communicated it to his client.

"But, oh, Heaven! this news that has saved me, what will it do for her, the dead man's sister?" sighed Benny.

"She is just and right-minded. And, although there will be the natural grief for the lost brother, yet she will suffer less than she would have done had you remained under the heavy imputation of blood-guiltiness. She will know, besides, that there has been no murder in the case, since there was no intention to kill. In due time she will take comfort," said Mr. Percy Mellias.

"Ah, she will be awfully shocked by the news. Who will venture to break it to her?" murmured the young man sorrowfully.

"That will I," answered the Earl of Wellrose gravely, as he arose from the table.

"Ah, my lord, it will be a painful task!" said Benny.

"I know it," murmured the earl. And then, after a pause, he said: "Mr. Hurst, will you do me a favor?"

"Assuredly, my lord."

"Will you, then, follow my advice to you—which is, to take a room here for the present, and wait till I can have an opportunity of consulting with you about your future career?"

"I will, Lord Wellrose, with thanks," replied Benjamin, who, for some occult reason, arising out of their unconscious blood relationship, or from some hidden sympathy or pure love and trust, or from all these causes combined, never felt the slightest sense of humiliation in receiving favors from his unknown brother.

"Quite right. Good-day, then. I will see you to-morrow morning. Good-day, Mr. Mellias," said the earl. And bowing to both his late companions, he left the room.

Outside he took a hansom and drove to Park Lane to break the news of her brother's death to Suzy.

He sent in his card, and in a few moments was invited into the drawing room, where he was received by Mrs. Brown.

The housekeeper's face wore the traces of recent tears, and her manner was very grave as she greeted Lord Wellrose, and said:

"I hope your lordship will excuse Miss Juniper this morning. She has just heard of the shocking death of her brother, and—"

"She has heard, then! From whom? Who has incautiously shocked her with the news?" exclaimed the earl.

"No one did, sir. She received a letter this morning from the French priest who attended her brother on his deathbed. He died a Christian, I am happy to say, sir. Poor young man! His head was a little turned with the company he kept, but his heart was not bad," said the housekeeper, willing to say all the good she could of the poor boy cut off in the flower of his wild youth.

"No," said the earl. And then, "How is Miss Juniper this morning?"

"Sir, she has been in hysterics ever since she got the news until about fifteen minutes ago, when we gave her an opiate, which composed her. She is now sleeping quietly."

"Keep her so," said the earl, as he arose to go. "And please to tell her when she awakes that I have been here, and will call at this hour to-morrow, when I hope she will be able to receive me."

And he bowed and left the house.

The next morning, when he called at Park Lane, Suzy received him in her rose parlor. And, though she was deadly pale, she was perfectly calm and collected, and she met him with quiet courtesy.

In reply to his expressions of sympathy and condolence, and to his implied rather than expressed questions as to herself, she answered that she should leave that day for France to be present at her brother's funeral; that soon afterward she should sail for Australia, to make a visit of duty to her parents.

"They must inevitably hear of their bereavement, you know, Lord Wellrose. And it is better that they should have the comfort of a visit from me at the same time," said Suzy.

"You are quite right, dearest," said the earl kindly.

He stayed a long time with her that morning, and with a promise to meet her at the railway station, and escort her to Dover to see her on board the Calais boat, he left her.

From Park Lane he went immediately to Trafalgar Square, and called at the Morley House to see Benny.

The young man received his visitor in his small bedroom on the third floor—the only apartment that his limited means could command.

"Now, my dear fellow, I have come on business. I wish to settle with you to-day about your future career. You are quite young enough to strike out into a new path. Now, what path would you like to take—the church, the law, medicine, the army or the navy? Take time to think, before deciding," said the earl kindly.

"If I might choose—" began Benny. And then he blushed like a girl, and paused.

"Choose! It is what I desire you to do. What would you like?"

"All England is arming for the Crimean war. I should like to enter the army."

Ah, poor boy! He had never known his father, yet he had inherited his father's martial passion. William Douglas had also wanted "to enter the army."

Lord Wellrose reflected for a few moments, during which Benny misinterpreted his silence, and hastened to say:

"Ah, forgive me, my lord! I spoke impulsively and without discretion. I know now how improper my wish is, since I have not the physical powers of endurance that would fit me to be a common soldier in war time, nor yet the education that would prepare me for the duties of an officer. You are right, my lord."

"You mistake me, my dear Hurst. I have been turning over in my mind the best and quietest way of meeting your views. And I have found it now. I have a young friend—Ensign Charley Blount, of the - - - regiment of foot. His regiment is ordered to the Crimea, and he does not want to go there. He wishes to sell out and stay at home. Good! His commission shall be purchased for you. You shall enter the army, and go to the war, Mr. Hurst; and, although you enter it only as an ensign, which is the lowest grade of commissioned officer, yet I feel persuaded that you will rise."

Constipation, Indigestion and Horrible Backaches

Where there is poison there is pain. This is a provision of Nature to warn you against conditions that are likely to prove serious.

Constipation of the bowels is undoubtedly the greatest source of disease and suffering. By using one of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills at bed-time as often as is necessary to keep the bowels regular you can cure constipation and the consequent indigestion, and remove the cause of backache, rheumatism and other painful diseases.

"Daily movement of the bowels" is the greatest law of health. Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills will help you to form this habit, add to your years, and bring comfort in old age.

Professor A. T. Smith, 1 Mt. Charles street, Montreal, and formerly of Boston, Mass., writes:—"I suffered for many years from bad digestion, constipation and horrible backaches. I have been treated by many doctors, without any results. One day a friend in Boston advised the use of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills. After using two boxes I noticed great improvement, and after the fourth box I was completely cured. My digestion is good. I never feel any pain in the back. My head is clear, and I feel like a young man. I think Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills are one of the best medicines on earth."

BUT BRITAIN STOOD FIRM.

(Philadelphia Record)

There are no legal complications in the case of the steamer Dacia. She carries a lading of cotton and nothing else; and cotton, by universal agreement of the nations, is declared noncontraband. The port of Bremen, for which the steamer is cleared, is not under blockade, so there is no question of blockade-running involved. Unless the British naval authorities have evidence to warrant a suspicion that the lading of the vessel is other than has been declared, the exercise of the right of search must be limited to an examination of the ship's papers. There is only one possible ground for controversy, namely, whether the status of a vessel with American registry is determined by American law or by the opinion of a British prize court; and this, from the American point of view, is not a ground for controversy at all. There is "nothing to arbitrate;" there is no basis even for diplomatic negotiations.

She Was In Bed For Seven Weeks

THEN DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS CURED MADAME BERUBE.

Montreal Lady Tells How, After Four Year's Illness, She Found a Complete Cure for all Her Troubles.

Montreal, Feb. 2.—(Special.)—Madame J. Baptiste Berube, residing at 1393 Logan avenue, this city, asserts that after four years suffering from kidney disease she has been completely restored to health by Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"I had a pain in my left side around the heart," Madame Berube says in her statement. "I suffered constantly with headache and backache, and for seven weeks I was in bed with kidney disease and feebleness. The doctor could not help me, so I decided to try Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"After the first box I was some better. I continued to use Dodd's Kidney Pills till now the palpitation has left me, and I am a well woman, able to do my work. Dodd's Kidney Pills cured me and I recommend them to all persons who suffer as I did."

Notice how many women are rising to tell their suffering sisters they can find relief in Dodd's Kidney Pills. The reason is that nine-tenths of women's ills spring from diseased or disordered kidneys. Every woman whose kidneys show signs of weakness should use Dodd's Kidney Pills.

MILITARY FOLLY.

(Buffalo Express)

This German disaster demonstrates what The Express pointed out at the time of the Scarborough raid, that the risking of valuable ships for the purpose of throwing a few shells into seaside resorts and killing the civil population is the greatest folly from a military point of view, besides being an act of inhumanity. Such manoeuvres are inspired by pride and hatred, rather than by cool, prudent calculation, and they were probably ordered by the highest civil authority, the Kaiser, rather than by the judgment of any trained naval officer.

MORAL WRONG, MILITARY BLUNDER.

(Rochester Herald)

If there never had been a treaty for Germany to violate, the invasion of Belgium was a moral wrong, indefensible in the court of international opinion.

It has also proved to be a fearful military blunder, of fearful cost to Germany. But that is a matter for Germany to settle with her general staff. Her violation of the rights of a peaceful state must ultimately be adjudicated before an international tribunal.

India Out of Matches.

A scarcity of matches is being felt in India, and if the war is protracted an absolute famine will likely result. Austria and Sweden did an extensive trade with India in matches and Japan was by no means a mean rival. It is practically impossible to get any matches from Sweden at present, and even consignments from Japan will be limited in quantity. Japanese matches are, moreover, not so popular as the others.

PRIVATE MANAGEMENT BEST.

(Montreal Gazette)

Socialists and Radicals in Great Britain have taken advantage of the situation created by the war to urge the nationalization of the shipping trade. Some in the United States who do not call themselves Socialists, are urging action that would nationalize part of the shipping. For the good of shipping it can be believed both proposals should fail. The shipping trade, like most others, is best managed by men who see opportunities and have the courage to seize them.

BELGIUM'S LANE.

It's a long lane that has no turning.
'Twas a long lane we know;
Led through Brussels then on to Paris,
That's a War Lord tried to hurry;
"Halt!" cried little Belgium;
"Your lane runs out here;
'Tis a chiffon, a little scrap of paper,
But your goal's right there."

It's a long lane that has no turning:
At the Marne that turn came;
Little Belgium called out her army,
Fought and suffered, not in vain;
Back, back 'long that lane go
Prussian Huns of War,
And they'll some day be at bay in Berlin,
For our goal's right there.

The words of the above two verses are so arranged that they may be sung to the chorus of Tipperary.

GERMANY'S SHAME.

(Buffalo Express)

The raid appears to have been of the same character as the naval raid on Scarborough and Hartlepool—an attack on the general population of the country, rather than upon any military works. Such operations can, of course, have no effect except to kill harmless people indiscriminately and destroy private property.

One of the unexplainable features of the war is the adoption by the German commanders of such measures as these, which are not only in violation of The Hague rules, but are without any tangible effect on the military operations that must determine the outcome of the war. Aerial attacks on armies, ammunition bases, etc., are legitimate and, if successful, accomplish a very useful purpose. Such enterprises reflect credit, in a military sense, on those who carry them out. But aerial attack or any other kind of attack on the ordinary civil population of a country was hardly to be expected as a policy of civilized nations in the twentieth century.

CHAPPED HANDS AND COLD SORES

No government has ever tried to run either a telegraph or a telephone, and succeeded in giving service up to the American standard. The European governments that operate these utilities are much better equipped for the business than is our own government. FORGETS JUSTICE.

(Chicago Tribune)

Because Great Britain has commanded the sea it is erroneous to suggest that the United States in permitting the exporting of arms to the allies is really acting in an unneutral manner.

Germany has the same right to buy arms in the United States as has any of the allies. She cannot ship them, but she can buy them and store them in this country. This would be a clever war move and the proper one for the Germans to undertake.

ITCHING RASH SPREAD OVER BODY

Could Not Sleep. Clothing Irritated. Impossible to Keep from Scratching. Used Cuticura Soap and Ointment. In Ten Days Well.

230 Dufferin Ave., Winnipeg, Man.—"I became troubled with a rash similar to hives on my face and arms. Later it spread over my body. This rash itched and burned and if rubbed the skin would become hot and red. It got so very itchy I could not sleep. The more I scratched the worse it got. I sat many minutes at a time with clenched hands to keep from irritating the rash and give my skin time to cool. The first few days the spots increased so rapidly that my body was dotted with them.

"The spots on my face and neck were so plainly visible, especially if I scratched them, that I avoided the folks in the house to hide my disfigurement. Every time my body became over-heated my clothing irritated the rash so much that it was impossible to keep from scratching the parts. Over two weeks of torture and sleepless nights I suffered.

"Knowing from experience that Cuticura Soap and Ointment were good I sent out to the drug store for some. I followed the directions and in a few days I noticed the rash was less; the spots began fading. In ten days I was completely well." (Signed) Mrs. John Lamb, June 11, 1914.

A CONFESSION.

(Rochester Post-Express)

President Wilson is credited with a sincere desire to keep our country out of the gigantic swirl of hate and horror which is convulsing half the world. If this is his paramount desire, as it ought to be, he should realize that this is no time to insist on new or forced construction of the rules, so far as they are such, under which belligerents have heretofore fought their wars. This is not a situation for such experiments as he tried on Mexico. He made no protests when Belgium was destroyed in defiance of treaties and Hague conventions which we and all the present belligerents were solemnly pledged to observe. In view of our failure to utter a word of remonstrance then, any interference on our part now with belligerents who are scrupulously obeying all the tacit conventions would be a terrible mistake. The utmost that we can properly ask is that in matters directly affecting us the allies conform to the international rules and usage prevailing when the war broke out. We did not ask Germany to do as much as that. And never even lisped a deprecatory whisper when on the plea of necessity she disregarded all treaties, conventions and civilized usages in her relations with Belgium and made a new law for herself.

THE RAID'S EFFECTS.

(Toronto Star)

These anarch bombs dropped into sleeping villages explain the futile desperation of the enemy.

And they have lost the sanity that should have enabled them to see how worse than futile these crimes are. Wherever a bomb falls a new regiment against them is jerked out of the British soil, and whenever the news of a fresh exploit in baby-killing spreads throughout the world, in every country under the sun, men of British breed lay down the hammer and the saw and the reaping hook and the book and the instruments of whatever kind they use, and take steamer for home to place the figures of armed men between little children and their slayers.

In every bomb they throw there is the seed of two regiments, one rising on the spot, and another from overseas.

UNFORTUNATE.

(Buffalo Express)

The German official statement continues to the effect that England has no right to be indignant, because English aeroplanes have bombarded the open towns of Friburg, Dares-Salaam and Swakopmund. It is rather unfortunate that the world never hears of a violation of the rules of war by the allies until the counter-violation to revenge the ac has caused an outburst of indignation against the Germans.

STUPID AND BARBAROUS.

(New York Sun)

"Considerable damage has been done," boasts the official bulletin of the raid on the English east coast. The truth is the damage to property was insignificant and the people killed were an old woman and one boy, while about thirty other persons were wounded. How can a nation be intimidated by such an infinitesimal percentage of mortality? The only effect of the barbarous aggression is to inflame the spirit of its people to white heat and to nerve them to give their lives willingly for the country if the sacrifice is required. So recruiting leaps to higher figures than ever, and money is poured out profusely to support the war to the bitter end. Hatred for an enemy who fights so foully possesses the gentlest natures. The rector of St. Peter's at Yarmouth spoke the common thought when he said: "It is our privilege who live on the east coast to be on the firing line, and we should brace ourselves to face the position with brave hearts."

To sum up, airship attack on unfortified places has no military value; there is no glory in it; it stimulates enlistment among the people outraged; it offends the moral sense of neutrals everywhere and alienates them. Therefore it is an amazingly stupid as well as a barbarous kind of warfare, and attempts to justify it insult the intelligence of the whole civilized world.

THE NICKEL QUESTION.

Does Canadian nickel, which is declared absolute contraband by the British Government, find its way into Germany? The question is not easy to answer. Sir Edward Grey's reply to the United States note referred to the large importation from the States of copper to neutral countries, but made no mention of nickel, nor have we seen any figures bearing on the matter. We understand that the Dominion Government has received assurances from the nickel companies that none of the product is reaching Germany. But that assurance can be taken for what it is worth. The agitation, principally confined to the Toronto World, that the export of Canadian nickel should be prohibited, meets with the opposition of the development companies in New Ontario, and so far the Dominion Government has taken no notice of the agitation. It may be that the British Government does not ask for the stoppage of its export because it does not want further to antagonize the United States Government. The suggestion is made that the industry be nationalized, so that the profit of private gain should be eliminated from the business. The Government would then have the matter in its own hands and would be able to see that none were disposed of that could by any chance get to Germany.

Whatever views the Dominion Government may have on the subject, we think that it should take the people into its confidence. Nothing should be allowed to happen in this country that can bring comfort to Germany, no matter what private interests suffer or at stake. Both Sir Robert Borden and the Hon. Mr. Hearst should speak out on the subject. Silence merely aggravates the situation, and leads to suspicion that neither the Dominion nor Provincial Government is acting in the public interest.

THE PRESIDENT AND GERMAN SHIPS.

Should President Wilson succeed in forcing his ship purchase bill through Congress, a critical state of affairs might easily arise between Great Britain and the United States, which well as Japan. Outside of the Treaty would draw in France and Russia as of London, which is not binding, should the bill become law, Britain would be called upon to judge if she would allow vessels bought from Germany to trade between that country and the States, in the light of common international law, which might be interpreted in a way the President would not like. On the face of it, the action of the President, if he succeeded, would be to give Germany an advantage which a neutral nation is not supposed to give. The Boston Herald says: "Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the administration's financiers, want to get rid of some ships, now useless to Germany and costing thousands of dollars a day in upkeep and repairs. It is a very big stake for which these financiers are playing. But for the administration to lend itself to it is little short of a national scandal." No doubt the President is actuated solely by a desire to benefit the shipping interests of the States, but there is a feeling that his movement is in the interest of Germany as well. The Detroit Free Press says:

> Agents of the Teutonic peoples have already been guilty of several attempts to sow the seeds of distrust and ill-feeling in this country. Men like Dr. Dernberg, Herman Ridder and Ambassador von Bernstorff, and publications such as "The Fatherland," have striven without pretense of concealment to this end. They have tried to revive old and forgotten and forgiven enmities which have been buried under the fact of a hundred years of peace. Some have even gone so far as to give voice to implied threats of what will happen to this nation in the event of Germany's final triumph, unless we show more friendship for Germany at this time.

We do not believe that President Wilson is influenced in any way by the advocates of Germany, but his bill cannot but affect British policy and plans adversely at a time when she should look for something like friendly neutrality from the States, and when the American people so largely sympathize with Britain in her present struggle. By her control of the Atlantic, Britain has driven German shipping from the sea, and the rehabilitation of these ships under American protection would practically take from her the fruits of her silent victory on the sea.

BAD BLOOD
Is The Cause of Boils and Pimples.

When boils or pimples start to break out on your face or body you may rest assured that the blood is in an impure state, and that before you can get rid of them it will be necessary for you to purify it by using a good medicine that will drive all the impurities out of the system.

Burdock Blood Bitters is a blood purifying remedy. One that has been on the market for the past forty years. One that is known from one end of the country to the other as the best blood purifier in existence. It cures boils, pimples and all other diseases arising from bad blood.

BOILS CURED.

Mr. Andrew B. Collier, River Glade, N.B., was troubled with boils for years, in fact, did not know what it was to be rid of them until he used Burdock Blood Bitters. It cured him.

PIMPLES CURED.

Mr. Otto Bayer, Yarker, Ont., had his face and neck break out with pimples. He tried several kinds of medicine without success. Two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters banished them.

Will the men-of-war have to stay in the Kiel Canal?

The French-Canadians are either entitled to or not entitled to have the French language taught at public expense in Ontario. The speakers of other languages are not entitled to have theirs thus taught. The courts ought to be able to settle the question as to the legality of the French-Canadian contention. Why not carry the matter to the foot of the throne and be done with it? Are they asking for this as a right or as a privilege? At the same time we admit that the French language is on a somewhat different footing in Canada than other foreign languages. Is it a foreign language?

General Nelson A. Miles of the United States army, thinks that "the curse" of polygamy may be permitted in Europe when the war is concluded, as was done in Germany after the Thirty Years' War, in the interest of a restored population. But Dr. Woods Hutchinson pooh-poohs this idea, declaring that not so many are being killed in the war as people may think. Of the 460,000,000 people in the countries involved there are only between 17,500,000 and 14,000,000 men in the field, or about 3 per cent., and not over 1 per cent. of those will be killed or die. Then the doctor says that many women will die in the meantime owing to the war and that polygamy will neither be necessary nor justifiable. We should think not.

The Winnipeg Free Press makes the charge that "from the outbreak of the war, the dirty game of party patronage has been played to the limit in connection with everything having to do with the raising, arming, equipping and maintaining of forces in Western Canada for the service of the Empire." It also charges that the allocation of commissions and positions of command has been made by party patronage committees resulting in the appointing of "political officers to command the men. To get a contract to supply wares to the troops, it declare that a tenderer must first be O K'd by the President of the Tory organization in Winnipeg. Hon. Robert Rogers is blamed for this deplorable state of affairs.

Is Now Done Away With.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills gently unlock the secretions, clear away all waste and effete matter from the system, and give tone and vitality to the whole intestinal tract.

They do this by acting directly on the liver, and making the bile pass through the bowels instead of allowing it to get into the blood, and thus causing constipation, jaundice, catarrh of the stomach and similar troubles.

Mrs. L. M. Rockfield, Peterboro, Ont., writes: "Having been troubled for years with constipation and trying many different remedies which did me no good whatever, I was asked to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. I have found them most beneficial, for they are indeed splendid pills, and I can gladly recommend them to all people who suffer from constipation."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all druggists or dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

A Public Idol

"She evidently did not want the question seriously opened," he said, "so I followed your advice and let it alone, and since then she has been charming both to Agnes and me. I feel myself as much of a brute as ever, but I see that the only thing I can do is to hold my tongue about it." To which Kendal heartily agreed.

A few days afterward the newspapers gave a prominent place to reports of Miss Bretherton's farewell performance. It had been a great social event. Half the distinguished people in London were present, led by royalty. London, in fact, could hardly bear to part with its favorite, and compliments, flowers, and farewells showered upon her. Kendal, who had not meant to go at the time when tickets were to be had, tried about the middle of the week after the Oxford Sunday to get a seat, but found it utterly impossible. He might have managed it by applying to her through Edward Wallace, but that he was unwilling to do, for various reasons. He told himself, after all, it was better to let her little note and his answer close his relations with her for the present. Everywhere else but in the theatre she might still regard him as her friend; but there they could not but be antagonistic in some degree one to another, and not even intellectually did Kendal wish just now to meet her on a footing of antagonism.

So, when Saturday night came, he passed the hours of Miss Bretherton's triumph at a ministerial evening party, where it seemed to him that the air was full of her name, and that half the guests were there as a pis-aller, because the Calliope could not receive them. And yet he thought he noticed in the common talk about her that criticism of her as an actress was a good deal more general than it had been at the beginning of the season. The little knot of persons with an opinion and reasons for it had gradually influenced the larger public. Nevertheless, there was no abatement whatever of the popular desire to see her, whether on the stage on in society. The engouement for her personally, for her beauty and her fresh pure womanliness, showed no sign of yielding, and would hold out, Kendal thought, for some time, against a much stronger current of depreciation on the intellectual side than had as yet set in.

He laid down the Monday paper with a smile of self scorn and muttered: "I should like to know how much she remembers by this time of the prig who lectured to her in Nuneham woods a week ago!" In the evening his Pall Mall Gazette told him that Miss Bretherton had crossed the channel that morning, en route for Paris and Venice. He fell to calculating the weeks which must elapse before his sister would be in Venice, and before he could hear of any meting between her and the Bretherton party, and wound up his calculations by deciding that London was already hot and would soon be empty, and that, as soon as he could gather together certain books he was in want of, he would carry them and his proofs down into Surrey, refuse all invitations to country houses, and devote himself to his work.

Before he left he paid a farewell call to Mrs. Stuart, who gave him full and enthusiastic accounts of Isabel Bretherton's last night, and informed him that her brother talked of following the Brethertons to Venice sometime in August.

"Albert," she said, speaking of her husband, "declares that he can not get away for more than three weeks, and that he must have same walking, so that what we propose at present is to pick up Edward at Venice at the end of August, and move up all together into the mountains afterward. Oh, Mr. Kendal," she went on a little nervously, as if not quite knowing whether to attack the subject or not, "it was devoted of you to throw yourself into the breach for Edward as you did at Oxford. I am afraid it must have been very disagreeable both to you and to her. When Edward told me of it next morning it made me cold to think of it. I made up my mind that our friendship—yours and ours—with her was over. But do you know she came to call on me that very afternoon—how she made time I don't know—but she did. Naturally, I was very uncomfortable, but she began to talk of it in the calmest way while we were having tea. 'Mr. Kendal was probably quite right,' she said, 'in thinking the part unsuited to me anyhow. I asked him for his opinion, and I should be a poor creature to mind his giving it.' And then she laughed and said that I must ask Edward to keep his eyes open for anything that would do better for her in the autumn. And since then she has behaved as if she had forgotten all about it. I never knew any one with less smallness about her."

"No; she is a fine creature," said Kendal, almost mechanically. How little Mrs. Stuart knew—or rather, how entirely remote she was from feeling—what had happened! It seemed to him that the emotion of that scene was still thrilling through all his pulses, yet to what ordinary little proportions had it been reduced in Mrs. Stuart's mind! He alone had seen the veil lifted, had come close to the energetic reality of the girl's nature. That Isabel Bretherton could feel so, could look so, was known only to him—the thought had pain in it, but the keenest pleasure also.

"Do you know," said Mrs. Stuart presently, with a touch of reproach in her voice, "that she asked for you on the last night?"

"Did she?"

"Yes. We had just gone on to the stage to see her after the curtain had fallen. It was such a pretty sight, you ought not to have missed it. The Prince had come to say good-bye to her, and, as we came in, she was just turning away in her long phantom dress with the white lace falling round her head like the Romney picture—don't you remember?—of Lady Hamilton—Mr. Forbes has drawn her in it two or three times. The stage was full of people, Mr. Forbes was there, of course, and Edward, and ourselves, and presently I heard her say to Edward, 'Is Mr. Kendal here? I did not see him in the house.' Edward said something about your not having been able to get a seat, which I thought clumsy of him, for, of course, we could have got some sort of place for you at the last moment. She didn't say anything, but I thought—if you won't mind my saying so, Mr. Kendal—that, considering all things, it would have been better if you had been there."

"It seems to me," said Kendal, with vexation in his voice, "that there is a fate against my doing anything as I ought to do it. I thought, on the whole, it would be better not to make a fuss about it when it came to the last. You see she must look upon me to some extent as a critical, if not a hostile, influence, and I did not wish to remind her of my existence."

"Oh, well," said Mrs. Stuart in her cheery common-sense way, "that evening was such an overwhelming experience that I don't suppose she could have felt any soreness toward anybody. And, do you know she is improved? I don't quite know what it is, but certainly one or two of those long scenes she does more intelligently, and even the death-scene is better—less monotonous. I sometimes think she will surprise us all yet."

"Very likely," said Kendal, absently, not in reality believing a word of it, but it was impossible to dissent.

"I hope so," exclaimed Mrs. Stuart, "with all my heart. She has been very depressed often these last weeks, and certainly, on the whole, people have been harder upon her than they were at first. I am so glad that she and your sister will meet in Venice. Madame de Chateauvieux is just the friend she wants."

Kendal walked home feeling the rankling of a fresh pin-point. She had asked for him, and he had not been there! What must she think, apparently but that, from a sour, morose consistency, he had refused to be a witness of her triumph!

Oh, hostile fates!

A week later Eustace was settled in the Surrey farm-house which had sheltered the Sunday league on its first expedition. The Surrey country was in its full glory; the first purple heather was fully out, and the distant hills rose blue and vaporous across stretches of vivid crimson, broken here and there by the dim gray greens of the furze or the sharper color of the bracken. The chorus of birds had died away, but the nests were not yet tenantless. The great sand-pit near the farm-house was still vocal with innumerable broods of sand martins, still enlivened by the constant skimming to and fro of the parent birds. And under Kendal's sitting-room window a pair of tomtits, which the party had watched that May Sunday, were just launching their young family on the world. One of his first walks was to that spot beyond the pond where they had made their afternoon camping ground. The nut-hatches had fled—fled, Kendal hoped, some time before, for the hand of the spoiler had been near their dwelling, and its fragments lay scattered on the ground. He presently learned to notice that he never heard the sharp sound of the bird's tapping beak among the woods without a little start of recollection.

Outside his walks, his days were spent in continuous literary effort. His book was in a condition which called for all his energies and he threw himself vigorously into it. The first weeks were taken up with a long review of Victor Hugo's prose and poetry, with a view to a final critical result. It seemed to him that there was stuff in the great Frenchman to suit all weathers and all skies. There were sombre, wind-swept days, when the stretches of brown ling not yet in flower, the hurrying clouds, and the bending trees, were in harmony with all the fierce tempestuous side of the great Romantic. There were others when the homely, tender, domestic aspect of the country formed a sort of framework and accompaniment to the simpler patriarchal elements in the books which Kendal had about him. Then, when the pages on Victor Hugo were written, those already printed on Chateaubriand began to dissatisfy him, and he steeped himself once more in the rolling artificial harmonies, the mingled beauty and falsity of one of the most wonderful of styles that he might draw from it its secrets and say a last just word about it.

He knew a few families in the neighborhood, but he kept away from them, and almost his only connection with the outer world, during his first month in the country, was his correspondence with Madame de Chateauvieux, who was at Etretat with her husband. She wrote her brother very lively, characteristic accounts of the life there, filling her letters with amusing sketches of the political or artistic celebrities with whom the little Norman town swarms in the season.

After the third or fourth letter, however, Kendal began to look restlessly at the Etretat postmark, to reflect that Marie had been there a long time, and to wonder she was not already tired of such a public sort of existence as the Etretat life. The bathing scenes and the fire-eating deputy, and the literary woman with a mission for the spread of naturalism, became very flat to him. He was astonished that his sister was not as anxious to start for Italy as he was to hear that she had done so.

This temper of his was connected with the fact that after the first of August he began to develop a curious impatience on the subject of the daily post. At Old House Farm the post was taken as leisurely as everything else; there was no regular delivery, and Kendal generally was content to trust to the casual mercies of the butcher or baker for his letters. But, after the date mentioned, it occurred to him that his letters reached him with an abominable irregularity, and that it would do his work no harm, but, on the contrary, much good, if he took a daily constitutional in the direction of the post-office, which gave a touch of official dignity to the wasteiest precincts of a grocer's shop in the village, some two miles off.

For some considerable number of days, however, his walks only furnished him with food for reflection on the common disproportion of means to ends in this life. His sister's persistence in sticking to the soil of France began to seem to him extraordinary. However, at last the monotony of the Etretat postmarks was broken by a postcard from Lyons. "We are here for the night on some business of Paul's; to-morrow we hope to be at Turin, and two or three days later at Venice. By the way, where will the Brethertons be? I must trust to my native wits, I suppose, when I get there. She is not the sort of light to be hidden under a bushel."

This post-card disturbed Kendal not a little, and he felt, irritably, that somebody had mismanaged matters. He had supposed, and indeed suggested, that Miss Bretherton should inclose his note in one of her own to his sister's Paris address, giving, at the same time, some indication of a place of a meeting in Venice. But if she had not done this, it was very possible that the two women might miss each other after all. Sometimes, when he had been contemplating this possibility with disgust, he would with a great effort make himself reflect why it was that he cared about the matter so disproportionately. Why was he so deeply interested in Isabel Bretherton's movements abroad, and in the meeting which would bring her, so to speak, once more into his own world? Why? Because it was impossible, he would answer himself indignantly, not to feel a profound interest in any woman who had ever shared as much emotion with you as she had with him in those moments at Nuneham, who had received a wound at your hands, had winced under it, and still had remained gracious, and kind, and womanly! "I should be a hard-hearted brute," he said to himself, "if I did not feel a very deep and peculiar interest in her—if I did not desire that Marie's friendship should abundantly make up to her for my blundering!"

Did he ever really deceive himself into imagining that this was all? It is difficult to say. The mind of a man no longer young, and trained in all the subtleties of thought, does not deal with an invading sentiment exactly as a youth would do with all his experience to come. It steals upon him more slowly, he is capable of disguising it to himself longer, of escaping from it into other interests. Passion is in its ultimate essence the same, wherever it appears and under whatever conditions, but it possesses itself of human life in different ways. Slowly, and certainly, the old primeval fire, the commonest, fatalest, divinest force of life, was making its way into Kendal's nature. But it was making its way against antagonistic forces of habit, tradition, self-restraint—it found a hundred other interests in possession—it had a strange inner crudity and timidity of nature to fight with. Kendal had been accustomed to live in other men's lives. Was he only just beginning to live his own?

But, however it was, he was at least conscious during this waiting time that life was full of some hidden savor; that his thoughts were never idle, never vacant; that, as he lay flat among the fern in his moments of rest, following the march of the clouds as they sailed divinely over the rich breadth and coloring of the commons, a whole brood of images nestled at his heart, or seemed to hover in the sunny air before him—visions of a slender form fashioned with Greek suppleness and majesty, of a soft and radiant presence, of looks all womanliness, and gestures all grace, of a smile like no other he had ever seen for charm, of a quick impulsive gait! He followed that figure through scene after scene; he saw primroses in its hand, and the pale spring blue above it; he recalled it standing tense and still with blanched cheek and fixed appealing eye, while all round the June woods murmured in the breeze; he surrounded it in imagination with the pomp and circumstance of the stage, and realized it as a centre of emotion to thousands. And then from memories he would pass on to speculations, from the scenes he knew to those he could only guess at, from the life of which he had seen a little to the larger and unexplored life beyond.

And so the days went on, and though he was impatient and restless, yet indoors his work was congenial to him, and out of doors the sun was bright, and all the while a certain little god lay hidden, speaking no articulate word, but waiting with a mischievous patience for the final overthrow of one more poor mortal.

At last the old postmistress, whom he had almost come to regard as cherishing a personal grudge against him, ceased to repulse him, and, after his seven years of famine, the years of abundance set in. For the space of three weeks letters from Venice lay waiting for him almost every alternate morning, and the heathery slopes between the farm and the village grew familiar with the spectacle of a tall thin man in a rough tweed suit struggling, as he walked, with sheets of foreign paper which the wind was doing its best to filch away from him.

"Casa Minghetti.

"My Dear Eustace,—I can only write you a very scrappy letter today, for we are just settling into our apartment, and the rooms are strewn in the most distracting way with boxes, books and garments; while my maid, Felicie, and the old Italian woman, Caterina, who is to cook and manage for us, seem to be able to do nothing—not even to put a chair straight, or order some bread to keep us from starving—without consulting me. Paul, taking advantage of a husband's prerogative, has gone off to flaner on the Piazza, while his women folk make life tolerable at home; which is a very unfair and spiteful version of his proceedings, for he has really gone as much on my business as on his own. I sent him—feeling his lack of misery, as he sat on a packing-case in the middle of the chaos, terribly on my mind—to see if he could find the English consul (whom he knows a little), and to discover from him, if possible, where your friends are. It is strange, as you say, that Miss Bretherton should not have written to me; but I incline to put it down to our old Jacques at home, who is getting more and more imbecile with the weight of years and infirmities, and is quite capable of forwarding to us all the letters which are not worth posting, and leaving all the important ones piled up in the hall to await our return. It is provoking, for, if the Bretherton party are not going to stay long in Venice, we may easily spend all our time in looking for each other: which will, indeed, be a lame and impotent conclusion. However, I have hopes of Paul's cleverness.

"And now, four o'clock! There is no help for it, my dear Eustace. I must go and instruct Caterina how not to poison us in our dinner tonight. She looks a dear old soul, but totally innocent of anything but Italian barbarities in the way of cooking. And Felicie she is well-meaning but ignorant, so, unless I wish to have Paul on my hands for a week, I must be off. This rough picnicking life, in Venice, of all places, is a curious little experience, but I made up my mind last time we were here that we would venture our precious selves in no more hotels. The heat, the mosquitoes, the horrors of the food, were too much. Here we have a garden, a kitchen, a cool sitting-room; and if I choose to feed Paul on tisane and milk puddings, who is to prevent me?

Commentary.—I. Removal to Moab (vs. 1-5). We are not told at what time during the period of the judges Elimelech and his family left Canaan for Moab. It has been thought by many that it might have been during the years in which the Midianites were overrunning the land of Israel and robbing the people of their produce. There may have been a famine because of long-continued drought. It is clear, however, that scarcity of food led this family, consisting of Elimelech, Naomi, his wife, and their sons, Manlon and Chilion, to seek better conditions in the land of Moab. The ten years spent by Naomi there were full of distressing experiences. Her husband died. Her sons married women of Moab. Later the sons died, leaving her alone with her two daughters-in-law, Orpah and Ruth. Jews are disposed to consider the afflictions that came to this family in the light of punishment, inflicted upon them for leaving the land of Israel and going into a heathen country, and for intermarrying with people of another race and religion. However this may be, we have the assurance that the Lord, by a peculiar train of providences, brought high honor to Ruth because of her choosing to live and die among God's people.

II. The return (vs. 6-10). 6. Then she arose — Naomi, after living in the land of Moab ten years, decided to return to her former home. This was Bethlehem, called Bethlehem-Judah, as distinguishing it from the Bethlehem in Zebulun. The country of Moab—This was a region forty or fifty miles from north to south, and twenty miles from east to west, lying east of the territory occupied by the tribes of Israel. She had heard— As there was not much intercourse between Israel and outside nations, it was probably some time after there came to be plenty in Israel before the news reached Naomi. Giving them bread—Acknowledgment is here devoutly made to God for the prosperity that Israel was enjoying. 7. They went on the way to return—Naomi and her daughters-in-law, Orpah and Ruth, set out together on the way to the land of Judah. Orpah and Ruth were going with Naomi to keep her company, for a part of the distance, out of respect and love for her. 8. Naomi said——Go, return—The time had come, as Naomi thought, for them to part. She was leaving the place where her loved ones had died, and now she must bid her loving daughters-in-law farewell, to go on alone. She thought they would be better off to remain in their own land and among their own people than to go into the land of Israel, for for she well knew the attitude of the Israelites toward people of other nations. Each to her mother's house—To the mother is given the special care of the daughter. The Lord deal kindly with you—Naomi would dismiss her loved ones with an earnest and humble prayer. As ye have dealt with the dead, and with me—Naomi paid a high tribute in these words to the character and conduct of her daughters-in-law. She approved of their treatment of her sons and of herself.

9. That ye may find rest—To find rest is an Oriental form of expression for entering the marriage state. This state is in general the divine order for men and women, and they who are happily married are restful. Each of you in the house of her husband—Naomi was making for Orpah and Ruth the best wish and prayer that she could frame. Then she kissed them—She was leaving them forever, as she thought, and bade them an affectionate farewell. Lifted up their voice, and wept—They thus expressed their grief at parting. 10. We will return with thee unto thy people—Naomi's attempt to send her daughters-in-law back was apparently unsuccessful. Her life in Moab and her attitude and conduct toward them were such as to win them to herself. So greatly were they taken up with her that they would bid farewell to country and kindred rather than say good-bye to her.

III. Two choices (vs 11-18). 11. That they may be your husbands—The Mosaic law required that if a man should die, leaving a wife and no child, the man's brother should marry sion to the law just mentioned, Naomi reminded her daughters-in-law that she she had no more sons who could her. In this connection and in allude their husbands. 12. Go your way—She would persuade them to return to their respective homes, for there were better prospects for them there, as she viewed the situation, than in the land of Israel. 13. Would ye stay for them from having husbands—Naomi first sets forth an improbable supposition, and then makes the thought of Orpah and Ruth's marrying sons that she might yet bear, to appear ridiculous. The hand of the Lord has gone out against me—Naomi felt that the Lord was permitting severe affliction to come upon her in taking away her husband and her sons. 14. Wept again—The Orientals are demonstrative in their grief. This scene must have been a most impressive one. Orpah kissed her mother-in-law—The last sad kiss of a tearful separation; after which she, unlike Ruth, turned back to her people and her gods. The great deity of the Moabites was Chemosh (Num 21: 29; Judges 11: 24.) Ruth clave unto her—Ruth was not yet convinced that it was best for her to return, nor was she persuaded to do so. 15. Return thou—Naomi tried to use to advantage the argument that Orpah had gone back, therefore Ruth should go also.

16. Intreat me not—Ruth's mind was made up. She had chosen to go with Naomi. Orpah might choose to return, but she was determined to go to the land of Israel. Whither thou goest, I will go—There was no hesitancy on Ruth's part. She knew she was going among a strange people, but she also knew the course she had chosen was the right one. Thy people shall be my people—Ruth severed forever her connection with her country and people, for she had found a better people and a better country. Thy God my God—This was an expression of her determination to love and serve the true God alone. 17. There will I be buried—The choice Ruth made was to be in force to the end of life. It was not an experiment with her. It meant everything to her to make the choice and she would never go back from what she had decided. 18. Stedfastly minded—Naomi was convinced that Ruth's choice was fully made and further argument and entreaty were useless, therefore she said no more against her going with her.

IV. Arrival at Bethlehem (vs. 19-22). The arrival of Naomi and Ruth in the city was soon generally known. The acquaintances of Naomi wondered if it were really she. She said, "Call me not Naomi; call me Mara," for Naomi means pleasant, and Mara means bitter. She felt that the Lord had testified against her and had afflicted her. Their arrival was in the time of barley harvest, or in April. Ruth at once found profitable employment as a gleaner in the field of Boaz and later became his wife.

Questions.—Where is Moab? What family went from Bethlehem to Moab? What led them to go? Who were Orpah and Ruth? How long was Naomi in Moab? What change came to the family in Moab? Why did Naomi decide to return to Bethlehem? What choices did Orpah and Ruth make with regard to going with Naomi? What arguments did Naomi use to persuade her daughters-in-law to return to their mothers' houses? How did Ruth express her decision?

Practical Survey.

Topic—True consecration.

I. The standard of Naomi's life.

II. The embodiment of Ruth's choice.

I. The standard of Naomi's life. We are here given a glimpse into the domestic life of Israel. The customs of the time were primitive and the habits of the people simple. Naomi and her two daughters-in-law in their widowhood present a pathetic picture. A common sorrow had brought them very close to one another. Naomi was a strong character. She proved herself a true Israelite indeed. God wonderfully supported her in all her afflictions. Her record at a pattern of patience and fidelity to all generations. An inevitable crisis came when Naomi resolved to return to Bethlehem. Her influence upon Ruth and Orpah was clearly manifest in their resolution to return with her. Naomi did not desire to prevent either of them from accompanying her to Canaan, but she did not wish them to do so simply for her sake. When she spoke of their kindness to her she did not contemplate how much their conduct was the result of her own. Her character as a true mother was "the stem around which the tendrils of their young hearts might climb to their mother's God." The character of both young widows is beautiful, but the best of parting revealed the heroine. Orpah loved Naomi and wept bitterly at parting from her. Ruth was fixed in her desire to cast in her lot with her desolate and destitute mother-in-law. Naomi was careful to put Ruth in an attitude of entire freedom. Orpah failed in courage though not in affection. Ruth's love led on to faith and a living heritage. All the elements of a true choice of God are here described in Naomi's dealings with her daughters-in-law. She stood firm in presenting the tests necessary for them to continue with her.

II. The embodiment of Ruth's choice. There is no utterance in the Old Testament more pathetic than Ruth's words of entreaty and resolve. Courage and sacrifice, love and devotion breathe all through them. The simple pathos and unstudied eloquence of her language is unsurpassed. Love and resolution were at their height. Lovely and gentle as she appeared, humbly and affectionately as she pleaded, there were amazing dignity and firmness in her resolve, the fervent outpouring of a true heart. Ruth does not appear to have bestowed a thought upon an accurate adjustment of duty and interest; nor to have considered whether her feelings were extravagant or reasonable; neither to have entertained any idea that she was making a sacrifice at all. The love of her yearning heart was her monitor and law. The marriage-bond had been to her a law of liberty because a law of love. At her marriage the current of her life had received its direction and in a nature like hers that was to be maintained forever. Her formness was the result of the thoughtful decision of her enlightened mind and consecrated heart. That strong and brave decision revealed a character of no ordinary quality. Her outward life was but the spontaneous outflow of the sum of all her actions and reached the utmost limit of her existence. The religion which her mother-in-law brought with her to Moab became Ruth's hope. One Gentile proselyte was thereby to be brought to the worship of Israel's God. Little was Naomi aware of the treasure she was bringing to Isreal, or of the honor which was in store for Ruth, or of the part she had in such soul-winning. Ruth's choice was prompt, humble, affectionate, determined and entire. She made the transfer of herself freely, completely and without reserve. Had her steadfastness depended upon her human relations alone and had her heart not rooted itself in the divine she would have followed Orpah. Her heart proved to be the true monitor and benefactor of her life. The crowning grace of her character was her piety. The utter unselfishness in her devotion is beautiful to contemplate. Human kindness, filial piety, affectionate constancy, uncomplaining toil, true chastity, sweet patience, strong faith and noble generosity are all found in this record of domestic life.

THE MENTALLY DEFECTIVE.

Large Percentage of People Less Than Normal.

In a recent contribution to the Illinois Medical Journal H. H. Goddard calls attention to the prevalence of feeble-mindedness and says: "The importance of this problem is recognized in an instant when we learn that at the very lowest estimate 25 per cent. of our criminals belong to this class. Perhaps 50 per cent. of our prostitutes are feeble-minded girls; the same is true of our paupers, our drunkards, our ne'er-do-wells; in fact, we now recognize that a large percentage of the various classes of people who make our social problems are mentally defective. Twenty-five per cent. is a minimum estimate, while it has been shown that in all probability 50 per cent. is much nearer the truth, and it may even run higher. A superintendent of one reformatory for men estimates that 75 per cent. of his inmates are feeble-minded; careful tests of the girls in a reform school have shown 72 per cent. feeble-minded. In fact, wherever there are any statistics it invariably points to the higher figure."

Rapid Transit Returns.

"I wouldn't be guilty of doing a favor for a man and then in a day or two asking him to do one for me."

"No, nor I. I'd ask him right straight off, before his gratitude got a chance to cool."

"Well, Father Can Play"

Yes, better than he ever thought possible! All the years that he has spent unable to play have been storing up a great fund of memories, and now that the

with the wonderful Meister-Touch Action has set his musical heart free from his untrained fingers, he finds himself able to give wonderful expression to whatever he plays.

He can play "Rule Britannia" or the "Marseillaise" with so much vigor and go that one's feet start marching whether or no, and to every other kind of music he brings the same genuine understanding of latent talent.

This superb instrument is the very finest example of player-piano making. Its [illegible] control of time and melody—its appearance—all are unexcelled.

CANADA'S BIG SHARE

Up to date and including the shipment which left by the steamship Calcutta from Halifax just before Christmas, Canada has sent to the suffering Belgians almost one million dollars worth of goods, not to say anything about cash contributions.

Ontario, according to the Consul Rochereau de la Sabliere, who is in charge of the contributions in the province, has responded splendidly to the appeal for help at this time. The consulate has been a busy place arranging the goods and having them re-shipped to Montreal and Halifax to be sent abroad.

The first shipment made on October 29, S. S. Tremorvah, included 1700 tons of potatoes, 140 tons of flour, 4000 cases of clothing, 1000 drums of cheese, 50 barrels of salted meat, 200 barrels salted fish and 6000 cases of canned goods. The Doric carried on Nov. 28th, 12,000 bags of flour, 11,000 barrels of potatoes 1100 cases of navy bread, 1500 boxes dried apples, 2000 cases of canned goods, 5000 packages of clothing. This week, besides 112000 bushels of wheat—the gift of Ontario and Quebec, the Calcutta steamed out with 84 carloads of flour, dried apples, clothing and miscellaneous goods. Besides all this there has been weekly shipments from Montreal, the headquarters of the relief committee.

With the available goods promised it is expected that 1500 cases will go on the fourth steamer. The executive, however, needs money to buy wheat for which it has had many pathetic appeals.

RURAL DEPOPULATION

The statistics of population gathered by the Ontario Department of Agriculture from the returns of municipal assessors have been proved by the Dominion census a trustworthy source of information. They showed according to an analysis made by the Weekly Sun, some time ago, that from 1911 to 1913 the rural or township population of Old Ontario decreased in forty counties 30,185 and increased in five counties 3,045. There was a net loss in two years of 27,139

The tide seems to have turned Comparing the statics of township population in these counties taken from the assessment reports of last spring statistics of 1913, it appears that only twenty-two counties show the following losses.

COSTS $15,962,000 DAY.

An exhaustive study of the cost of the European war has just appeared in the Berlin Vorwaerts, a Socialist newspaper.

The military expenditures of the British Empire are given as about $4,250,000 a day, or $637,500,000 up to Jan. 1. The cost of the war to France up to Dec. 10 is given as $1,288,200,000, or, difference in time considered, more than twice the amount spent by Great Britain.

Taking the Russian expenditures to Nov. 15 as a basis, it is shown that the Russian campaign has so far cost $9,200,000 a day, or $1,380,000,000 up to Jan. 1. The expenditures of the Belgian, Servian and Japanese governments are given as about $1,600,000 a day, or roundly, $240,000,000 up to Jan. 1.

The figures also show that it costs the Allies $2.05 a day to keep a man in the field.

The following is given by the Vorwaerts as a table of expenditures made by the governments of the Triple Entente and their allies:

	Cost a day	To Jan. 1
Great Britain	$4,250,000	$637,500,000
France	9,912,000	1,170,800,000
Russia	9,200,000	1,330,000,000
Their Allies	1,600,000	240,000,000

No detailed amounts are given in relation of the war to Germany and Austria-Hungary. The statement is made, however, that the cost for the two is $21,000,000 a day, or $3,150,000,000 up to Jan. 1

Adding the expenditures of all the nations at war, the daily total is about $15,962,000, and the total up to Jan. 1, $6,894,300,000.

The Detroit Tribune, a morning paper established 79 years ago, has been merged with the Detroit News, and the morning publication except on Sundays, will be discontinued. The European war is causing great havoc in the newspaper publishing business in the United States as well as in Canada. The cost of production now exceeds the revenues in most cases, the smallest factor of which latter is the receipts from circulation.

There is a reason why few young men from the rural districts of Ontario have been enlisting for the service at the front, besides that of not feeling the urgency of the call to the same extent as do the young men in the towns and cities, that is they are not there to enlist, as they were to enlist and did for service against the Fenians in 1866. Another reason is that where there are young men on the farm it is difficult to get help to replace them, in some case it would be impossible. On some farms there are no young men, on others there may be one, and in others more. Where the latter is the case there would not seem to be much excuse: When all feel that the call is imperative they will readily respond.

A POSITIVE CURE FOR RHEUMATISM

Hundreds of People Have Found "Fruit-a-tives" Their Only Help

READ THIS LETTER

35 DOVERCOURT ROAD, Oct., 1st. 1913.

"For a long time, I have thought of writing you regarding what I term a most remarkable cure effected by your remedy "Fruit-a-tives". I suffered from Rheumatism, especially in my hands. I have spent a lot of money without any good results. I have taken "Fruit-a-tives" for 18 months now, and am pleased to tell you that I am cured. All the enlargement has not left my hands and perhaps never will, but the soreness is all gone and I can do any kind of work. I have gained 35 pounds in 18 months".

R. A. WAUGH

Rheumatism is no longer the dreaded disease it once was. Rheumatism is no longer one of the "Incurable diseases". "Fruit-a-tives" has proved its marvellous powers over Rheumatism, Sciatica, Lumbago—in fact, over all such diseases which arise from some derangement of stomach, bowels, kidneys or skin.

"Fruit-a-tives" is sold by all dealers at 50c. a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c. or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

The History of the County of Bruce

And of The

Minor Municipalities Therein

(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)

Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps, Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

Arrangements have been made by the Post Office Department whereas the ordinary rate of two cents per ounce applicable to all letters sent from Canada to the United Kingdom, will now apply to letters addressed to the British and Canadian troops in France and Belgium where the rate generally is five cents.

One day at a time is the secret of every noble life. One day at a time taken up bravely with its duties faithfully done as they come. Its trials patiently borne, its temptations firmly resisted, its crosses cheerfully carried its joys rightly used and its gladness gathered from every hour as it passes on. Instead of making many resolutions at the first of the year to be quickly broken, let us so live to meet each day bravely and take what it brings unquestionably.

The days, weeks and years slip away like water in a running stream. Times great clock never loses a moment. Relentlessly, surely the moments pass, and our eager hands are not able to detain them. We cannot keep back the flying years, but we can and should keep the blessings they bring. Hold fast to the lessons they have taught. Keep the memory of their joys. Enrich every day of life with the garnered wealth of the days behind.

The third Canadian Contingent will recruit at Guelph. Bruce County has been asked to supply 150 men and to judge from the present activities this number will be easily supplied.—Mildmay Gazette.
The Gazette man is apparently endeavoring to leave the impression with his readers that there is no more room for recruits in the third, but this is not the case. Of the 150 men required from Bruce only 70 have enrolled, and the officials are sending out an urgent call for additional volunteers. Yet the Gazette has the audacity to claim that men required would easily be supplied. The Mildmay scribe has been very timid in respect to the enlisting of the three contingents and naturally so for Mildmay's response to the call of King and Country for the three contingents has been limited to one man.

TO START FLAX MILL

Mr. George Anderson, ex-M.P.P., was in town on Tuesday looking over the flax mill, with a view to purchasing the industry. We understand he was pleased with the proposition and it is to be hoped that he will unite with others in re-organizing the company. Mr. Anderson generally makes a success of every enterprise that he launches, and if he puts his shoulder to the wheel the flag industry will move as it never moved before. There is bright prospects for the flax industry in the near future as all the flax-producing countries of Europe are at war.—Ripley Express.

The average life of army horses when put on active service at the front is only about ten days, and consequently the demand for remounts from Canada is steadily increasing. The war Office is asking for increased supplies from Canada, and it is understood that a considerable number of the horses purchased for the second Canadian contingent are to be shipped at once to England. They will be replaced by further purchases from the farmers of Canada, under direction of the purchasing committee appointed by the Government.

The year 1915 comprises the latter part of the 139th. and the beginning of the 140 h. year of American independence and it corresponds to the year 6628 of the Julian period, the year 5675-5676 of the Jewish era; the year 2668 since the foundation of Rome the year 2575 of the Japanese era, and the year 1915 of the Mohammedan era In the year 1915 there will be two eclipses, both of the sun. The first will be the annular eclipse on February 12th., visible to Australia and large parts of the Indian and Pacific Ocean and the second will be on August 10th visible in eastern Asia.

EDITOR WAS NETTLED

Day before yesterday a perfectly nice lady called us up and, with tears in her voice, reproved us for not mentioning the fact that she had had a friend visiting her last week. We told her that she had not let us know about it and therefore we did not know she had a visitor. Then she said, "Well you should have known, I thought you were running a newspaper." Wouldn't that rattle your slats? Some people think that an editor ought to be a cross between Argus and Anna Eva Fay. They seem to thing that our five senses are augmented by a sixth that lets us know everything that happens, even if we see, hear, feel, taste or smell it not. Dear lady, editors are only human. If you have a friend visiting you, if you are going away, if Johnnie falls and breaks his arm, if your husband chops his toe instead of a piece of wood; if anything happens that makes you glad or sad, happy or mad, call us up. Tell us about it. That's the way to get it in the paper.--Gore Bay Recorder."

LEAVING FOR FRANCE

At last the order has come for the Canadians at Salisbury to leave for France. Although nothing official has been made public it is common knowledge throughout the camp that the Canadian contingent will begin embarkation for the contingent this week. Already the cavalry division has gone, it having been found necessary to move them to Southern France in order to save the horses and so that the men might be enabled to continue their training, which was rendered practically impossible by the terrible weather conditions on Salisbury Plain. Now comes the order for the rest of the first contingent. The whole camp is happy. The men have chafed under the unusual restraint of English army discipline, but they have accepted conditions as they found them and all they ask now is to be allowed to go to the firing line as soon as possible. It is not known from what port they will embark. The effect upon the men has been remarkable. Everywhere their is ample evidence of the highest spirits and rejoicing that at last the boys from the Dominion are to be given their chance.

SPELL IT BACKWARDS

Four little girls in Salem, Mass., had rehearsed for a sunday school concert in which each was to recite a piece and then turn a letter to the audience, the combined letters spelling "S T A R" signifying the Star of Bethlehem. Unfortunately at the concert the girls went out onto the stage from the wrong side so that when the turning process was completed the letters spelled "R A T S."

MARRYING AFTER JOINING

Men who marry after joining the Canadian contingents, must provide for the support of their wives. H. B. Ames, M. P. Honorary Secretary of the Patriotic Fund in commenting on this decision by the Government said that the organizers of the fund had decided to support it in this step. He said there appeared to have been an epidemic in marrying after men had enlisted.

BIG NAVAL GUNS

Two 16.1-inch guns, the biggest ever manufactured in America and shipped to a foreign nation, were lashed to the deck of the Cunard Liner, Transylvania, when she sailed for Liverpool from New York on Friday last. They were consigned to the British Navy and will be taken to the Harland and Wolff shipbuilding yards in Belfast, where British warships are now under rush construction. Each gun is fifty-three feet long and weighs 7.8 tons. They represented part of a big order for war supplies which Charles M. Schwab secured for the Bethlehem Steel Co. shortly after the outbreak of war. The Transylvania also carried the inner skin of a battleship turret, which was consigned to Harland and Wolff.

ACROSS THE CONTINENT

Talking by telephone across the continent, linking the Atlantic and Pacific by a speech canal just as the big ditch across the Isthmus of Panama joins the two oceans by a water-way, that is one big feature of this week's news. Alexander Graham Bell inventor of the telephone, talks from New York to Thos. A. Watson, 3,400 miles away in San Francisco. And as they talk they think of that day thirty-nine years ago when with much shouting and endless repetition they achieved the first long-distance conversation by telephone over a distance of two and one-half miles from Cambridgeport to Boston. Their transcontinental talk of Monday last over 3,400 miles of mountain and valley, desert and plain, was carried on with as much ease as if they had been at opposite ends of the same room whereas the earlier one of two odd miles was achieved only with much labor, anxiety and uncertainty.

LICENSE REDUCTION

Hanover will have one liquor licence less after next May. The town council acted on largely signed petition presented by the W.C.T.U. last Friday evening asking for license reduction. The ladies asked to have 2 licenses of the four in operation here cut off, but a motion to that effect was defeated by a vote of th. council.--Hanover Post.

WILL BE SPECIAL TAXES

The arrangements are going ahead for the opening of Parliament, on Thursday, members have already arrived to take up residence. Of outstanding importance is the question of war taxes or rather the raising of revenue necessitated by the conflict. The amount is roughly estimated at $150,000,000. The changes in view are naturally guarded with the greatest secrecy, with a view of preventing importers from taking undue advantage. There is little doubt that luxuries will pay a heavier duty, and probably of a considerable amount. Special taxes imposed will in all probability be a stamp tax on banking and legal documents, and very probably an increased direct tax on banks and other financial institutions chartered by Federal Government. At least seven or eight millions additional annually must be raised. Fortunately there is no bonded indebtedness falling due for four years.

BIG ORDER FOR SHRAPNEL

Mr. Gordon N. Griffin, Manager of the Canada Beds, Limited returned on Saturday night from Montreal where he got a signed order from Col. Bertram, chairman of the shell committee for 25,000 eighteen stroke No. 111 shrapnel, says the Chesley Enterprise. The Dominion Government supplies the shell and bullets and they are loaded here, with the exception of the time fuses which are put in at Woolwich, England. The job is worth about $100,000 and will take until October 1st to complete, Mr. G. N. Griffin Manager of the Canada Beds, deserves credit for landing such a big order when so many foundries are after orders. The price at which the shells are to be manufactured is set by the Government. Mr. Griffin is in Toronto ordering the special machinery for manufacturing these shells, the cost of which will be approximately $12,000 Two shifts of 15 men each will be employed for 12 hours each, making work for 30 men. There will be work for everybody and no man need go idle in this town or community because preference will be given to the local workingmen. The manufacture of the Sharpnel will begin about March 1st.

FEDERAL ELECTION TALK

A rumor on the streets of Toronto revives Federal election talk. The latest suggestion is that the Government will seek the approval of the people for the new taxes to be imposed to provide for military expenditure, and bring on an election in May. No verification of this could be obtained from politically informed men Toronto. A Conservative member from a nearby constituency who visited Ottawa last week, is of the opinion that the coming session will last until Easter, with another meeting of the House in the fall and an election in the spring of 1916. It is pointed out that the voters' list in eight Northern Ontario ridings have not been revised since 1911, and legally this should be done at least one year before an election.

SHOOTING ATTACK

Lakelet was all excitement last week on Wednesday over an attempted shooting attack upon young Robert Caudle by Tom Bennett. Young Caudle resented some very abusive language directed at his mother and sister by Bennett and when the latter refused to go away, Caudle hit him across the legs with his whip. In a fearful passion, Bennet rushed to where his old shotgun was lying and while Caudle had his back turned and was preparing to drive away with his team, Tom drew his musket and fired the shot missing Caudle's head by a very narrow margin. Realizing he had missed, Bennet tried to re-load for a second shot, but was overpowered by Henry Huth, the blacksmith, who succeeded in taking the gun away from him. Instead of feeling remorse over the perpetration of his insane act, Bennet's only regret was that he had failed in his purpose of finishing the younger man. Constable John Wolfe arrested Bennet and after his preliminary hearing before F. Dixon, J. P., had him removed to the cells at Goderich where he will await trial. During the past twenty years Bennet has been a public nuisance, and though he has been in jail on various charges at regular intervals during his checkered career, the present charge against him is the most serious and he will, no doubt, be sentenced to a few years stretch in the penitentiary at Kingston on the charge of shooting with intent to kill. Bennet is known to possess a violent temper when under the influence of liquor, and it is thought he had secured a supply of cider somewhere before the shooting affray took place. If this is the case the man who supplied him with the liquor is in a sense responsible and will, no doubt, figure prominently in the trial case.—Mildmay Gazette.

PERRIN'S TIPPERARY BISCUITS

It's not such a "long way to Tipperary" Biscuits—just as far as the nearest grocery store.

Each one bears a picture—troops of the allied armies. Each one is crisp, brown, and delicious. Say Tipperary to your grocer.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

FAITHFUL WAR HORSE.

A Welshman, a driver in the Royal Field Artillery, told the following simple story about his horses in the war:

"I had driven them for three years. I tell you I could talk to them just as I am talking to you. There was not a word I said that they did not understand. And they could answer me—they could, indeed. I was never once at a loss to know what they meant. When I was astride one of them—why I had only got to think what I wanted him to do and he would do it without being told.

"Early in the retreat from Mons a shell crashed right into the midst of the section with which I was moving. A driver in front of me was blown to bits. My gun was wrecked. I was ordered to help with another. As I mounted the fresh horse to continue the retreat I saw my two horses struggling and kicking on the ground to free themselves. I could not go back to them. I tell you it hurt me.

"Suddenly a French chasseur dashed up to them, cut the traces, and set them at liberty. I was a good way ahead by that time, but I kept looking back at them, and I could tell that they saw me directly they were on their feet.

"Those horses followed me for four days. We stopped for hardly five minutes and I could not get back to them. There was no work for them, but they kept their places in the line like trained soldiers. They were following me to the very end, and the thought occurred a thousand times, 'What do they think of me on another horse?' Whenever I looked there they were in the line, watching me so anxiously and sorrowfully as to make me feel guilty of deserting them. Whenever the word 'Halt!' ran down the column I held up my hand to them and they saw it every time. They stopped instantly.

"Whether they got anything to eat I do not know. I wonder whether they dropped out from sheer exhaustion—I hope to heaven it was not that. At any rate one morning when the retreat was all but over I missed them. I suppose I shall never see them again. That's the sort of thing that hurts a soldier in war."

MYSTERY BOX STILL SEALED.

The world will have to wait longer than it expected for the revelation of the secret of Joanna Southcott's mystery box, which has been locked up for a hundred years.

Joanna Southcott, daughter of a farmer and for some time a domestic servant, declared that she possessed supernatural powers, and wrote and dictated prophecies in rhyme. She died on October 29th, 1814, leaving to her followers, "The Box of Sealed Writings." This, it has always been understood, was to be opened on January 12th, 1915, "by twenty-four bishops."

The chief follower of the present day is Alice Seymour, of Crapstone, Yelverton, Devon. In a Christmas circular to the faithful, she declared that the box was "not foretold to be opened in 1916," but will be sent for by the bishops "suddenly and unaware" in a time of national danger, and that the bishops can be represented by their chaplains or other appointed clergy.

PRINCE'S £100,000 IN GIFTS.

The Government has accepted an offer made by the Maharajah Scindia of Gwalior to establish and equip a convalescent home for Indian officers and sepoys in the East African Protectorate.

Only a week ago the Maharajah Scindia presented a fleet of motor-ambulance-cars, motor-lorries, and motor-cycles, costing £25,000, to the King for the Army and Navy. He has also fitted out, in conjunction with the Begum of Bhopal, the hospital ship Loyalty (formerly the liner Empress of India), containing 500 beds. Other contributions are:

£10,000 for the Prince of Wales' Relief Fund.

£15,000 for motor transport.

£6,000 for Belgian refugees.

£5,000 for officers' motor-cars.

£1,000 for telescopes.

A conservative estimate of the Maharajah's gifts is £100,000.

FALL IN SHIPBUILDING.

There has been a little slackening of trade in the shipbuilding yards since the war. At the end of last year, excluding warships, there were 462 vessels of 1,621,316 tons under construction in the United Kingdom, according to Lloyd's Register of Shipbuilding, which only takes into account vessels of 100 tons and over.

This is a decrease of 96,000 tons since September last and 329,000 tons less than the total building in 1913, a record year. Glasgow again leads with 96 vessels of 398,028 tons, and Belfast is second with 28 vessels of 329,000 tons. There are 28 vessels between 100,000 and 40,000 tons being built.

SCOTS FUSILIER HERO.

The King has approved of the grant of the Medal for Distinguished Conduct in the Field to Private H. Graham, 1st Royal Scots Fusiliers, for Gallantry on September 11, near Vailly, during a temporary retirement from a forward position, when he carried a wounded comrade, under heavy fire, into safety; on hearing that another wounded man had been left behind he at once returned and brought him also away to cover.

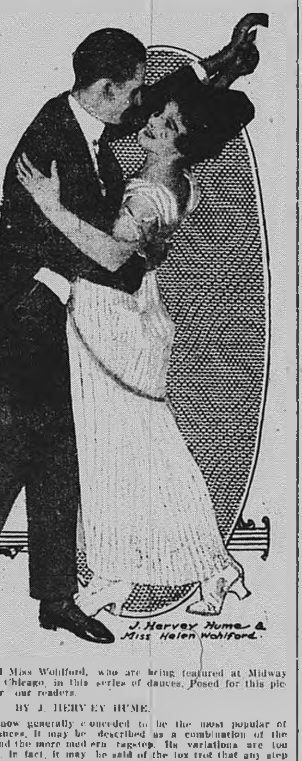
Steps In the Newest Dances

The Beautiful "Draw Step" In the New "Fox Trot"



J. Hervey Hume & Miss Helen Wohlford.

J. Hervey Hume and Miss Wohlford, who are being featured at Midway Winter Gardens, Chicago, in this series of dances. Posed for this picture especially for our readers.

BY J. HERVEY HUME.

The fox trot is now generally conceded to be the most popular of the new ball room dances. It may be described as a combination of the old "negro shuffle" and the more modern ragstep. Its variations are too numerous to mention. In fact, it may be said of the fox trot that any step which is done in unison with the fox-trot music may be called fox-trotting.

Life no doubt is paved with enjoyments, but we must all expect times of anxiety, of suffering and of sorrow; and when these come it is an inestimable comfort to have some deep interest which will, at any rate to some extent, enable us to escape from ourselves.—Sir John Lubbock.

HATRED OF BRITAIN GERMAN INCENTIVE

Aachen, Germany.—Military experts, attaches, journalists, authors, short story writers, and "Tommies" back from the trenches have discussed the future of the war.

As an American reporter, one who has observed the change that has taken place in Germany in the last few weeks, permit me not only to discuss the new objective of the German army but to indicate about where the first great battle may take place and what its immediate results may be.

This forecast is based on things I have seen, movements of troops, change of bases, preparations for the big battle, and the new dominating motive of all general plans of the German empire—the all comprehending motive of terrible hate for England.

PLANS TO INVADE ENGLAND.

Germany plans to invade England a plan that will be supported by a public opinion in the fatherland without regard to the hazard, the ultimate result, or the slaughter that must reach a bewildering total.

The data, based on personal observations and interviews throughout Belgium and in the frontier towns of Germany, and a certain alleged intuitive sense suggest that the supreme battle of the conflict, beside which the clashes already occurring will be secondary, both with respect to the number of men engaged and the casualties, may be fought somewhere within the triangle described by Ostend or the Flemish coast, Calais on the French coast, and Lille as the apex.

To the so-called military experts this forecast may appear presumptuous. Yet it may be here set down with perfect propriety that the average reporter's prediction of events not far off in this Armageddon is about as good a guess as any. Military science, as the experts would understand it, in a measure has been throw stand it, in a measure has been thrown to the four winds by the German war leaders in the last three weeks. That is, the general plan is no longer hidden.

To understand this one has to know by personal experience the awful hatred that has turned all public opinion in Germany into one channel and with but one objective—England.

AFTER NEW SUBMARINE BASE.

Germany has announced boldly that it will stake everything on a dash to Calais and Dunkirk from the east and south and to Nieuport from the north, with the avowed intention of establishing a new submarine base at the narrowest point of the channel with which to attack the English fleet to whittle it down.

Germany will not fight the English fleet with German battleships under the present relative armament. Germany definitely intends to pit its undersea craft against English dreadnaughts, hoping for such successful raids in time as will seriously cripple the naval power of the hated antagonist and bring about a more nearly equal strength.

To cross the English channel, destroy English shipping, invade the island, raze the coast towns, reduce London—to do this the German nation to-day would make any sacrifice humanly possibly. Such a programme may be untenable, but it will explain the movements of the last three weeks and movements that will be made in the next three or four weeks. However, a recurrence of the daring raid successfully made on the east coast at Scarborough and Whitby may be expected or at least attempted.

HATRED EXTRAORDINARY

The hatred felt toward England by the German people passes beyond the mere meaning of the word as used in ordinary conversation. This feeling toward Great Britain pervades the fatherland and finds lodgment in the breasts of all the people in the great family of 70,000,000 souls.

A prominent manufacturer in Hamburg, discussing this phase of the war development in Germany, says:

"To get at England, to humble that people and, if possible, destroy that nation is the one big thing we now desire. We will fight, too, as long as there is a single German left in Germany. We may be repulsed. We may be forced to retreat, but never will we surrender. The [illegible] in the empire will give the last drop of their blood."

This was a conservative business man, highly educated.

"My own family have been given to the war and they have died in battle. I do not regret it," he went on. "I shall be glad of it if their death we in the end shall destroy England."

A waiter in a cafe in Aachen said to me:

"We feel for the poor French. We don't like to kill them. They were fooled. The Russians the same. They are big untrained boys, and our guns kill thousands of them. It is a pity. But England, ach! we'll destroy them; we'll cut them all to death, and then end the war."

I walked several miles through the wald in the hills behind Aachen stopping at the forest cafes and restaurants. Everywhere it was the same—hatred of England.

NOT CASE AT OUTSET.

At the outset of the war this was not the case. The Germans set about their task with a precision and completeness that amazed the world. But the intensity of the hatred toward England was not aroused among the German people at home until after the Belgians had stayed the mighty hordes long enough to permit England to rush its forces across the Channel and form the junction with the French.

All Germany believed for days that Paris had fallen; that the English Channel was in the possession of Von Tirpitz' dreadnaughts. There was rejoicing in the fatherland.

Then came the awakening. The news percolated through somehow despite censoring, of course slowly, that something had happened a few miles this side of Paris, that Paris was not in the possession of the Uhlans, that the great gray line of the invading infantry had been pushed back. Finally it dawned upon the people of Germany that Paris had been saved from the invasion. Germany awoke to learn that for forty days the conquering imperial army, the terror of half a dozen nations, the unbeatable Uhlan and his lance, had been stopped.

PUBLIC OPINION DIRECTED.

Now comes the psychology of directing public opinion in the fatherland. The people did not want excuses, but a justification and a new patriotism. The government gave it to them. England was blamed for the antagonistic sentiment among the neutrals. The London press just at this moment is picturing the devastation of Belgium with all the power of language and ascribing to the Germans crimes of the most dreadful nature, culminating in the "last straw," the epithets "Huns" and "barbarians."

The word "Hun" simply causes the average German to go straight up in the air. I have seen hate depicted on faces before in my life, but I never saw such as this. Pointing to the octagon of Charlemagne's tower at the great Dom, with the swaddling clothes of the Infant Saviour and the sheet that clothed His body as he was lowered from the cross, there in that sacred chapel, the Germans ask if a Hun did that. They point to the Rathaus, to the marvelous mural paintings of Leo III and Carlos I and ask if they are Huns who have preserved such as these.

So they have gone through the whole list, enumerating the great cathedrals, Cologne particularly, the places of enduring art and science and music, the evidences, they insist, of a culture unequaled by any other nation, and inquire if a Hun did that.

AROUSES NEW PATRIOTISM.

The Germans have been taught for years that England was jealous of Teutonic commercial growth and that England would sooner or later make war on Germany because of the almighty dollar aspect alone. There always has been a sort of latent dislike for Great Britain. It required only this last campaign of resistance against the Hun epithet to arouse a new patriotism in Germany. There is not this terrible hate against Russia and France—only against England and the Japs.

Accordingly there is one great stroke the Germany army can attempt that will be supported to a man regardless of the outcome, and that is a beeline march to the English coast. That is what the German general staff now proposes in my judgment.

TOO FAR FROM ENGLAND

The Germans now hold Zeebrugge and Ostend on the North Flemish coast, but they are of little importance at this time, because they are too far away from the Kentish coast of Great Britain, whereas the British dreadnoughts are able to form their lines a sufficient distance from the towns of Flanders to be invisible while shelling the seaports with great accuracy and with great jeopardy to the German columns and even the German heavy artillery, which has been brought up thus far only in small units and with the greatest difficulty.

The Germans now want Calais worse than they have wanted any position since they suffered their first set-back. If they could take Calais, only Nieuport on the Flemish coast and Dunkirk on the French coast would remain in hostile hands on this water front. With these two citadels in its hands Germany could command the coast from the Netherlands frontier to Calais.

WOULD THREATEN HOLLAND

What would happen if German got this seacoast? The first step would be an ultimatum, undoubtedly, to Holland to give the Germans a water outlet through the Scheldt from Antwerp the effect of which, if conceded would be to aid the invaders in a thousand different ways.

If Holland refused Holland would be invaded.

With this coast in their possession the Germans would try to establish at Calais a new submarine base, from which they might prey on English shipping of all kinds and pick off the British dreadnoughts one by one before bringing their flotilla out of Kiel and into the North Sea and the channel for a finish fight.

If Germany is determined to go to Calais at all hazards then it must follow that the triangle heretofore drawn—Nieuport to Lille to Calais—will enclose the field on which will be fought the battle that will affect the entire conduct of the subsequent war, if not prove the beginning of the end.

GERMANY VIRTUALLY ISOLATED.

Leaders among the allies are certain the Germans will fail in this supreme attempt. Germany, they argue, is isolated from the rest of the world. It is forced to rely almost wholly on its own resources. It has 3,000,000 men in the field. About 800,000 have been killed, wounded, captured, or are sick.

It claims that another 1,000,000 reserves are ready for business. But it must throw back the Russian horde on the east and protect its southwestern frontier from the French.

How many men it could force into the triangle for the great effort is problematical. Whether it could properly arm such a force and provide it with ample ammunition is a question.

On the other hand, Great Britain, its defenders point out, has protected its commerce throughout the war. It is receiving supplies from every quarter of the globe. Every ship comes laden with the munitions of war—foodstuffs, ammunition, arms, and in many instances territorials. Almost daily it is pouring soldiers across the Channel. Great Britain probably could put another half million men into the field.

FRENCH HAVE COME BACK.

Meanwhile the French have come back. They are not the French of 1870. They are a regenerated race of warriors, such warriors as fought under the grand marshals of France a century ago. The French have demonstrated their superiority with the heavy artillery as well as in many branches of the field of work.

When it comes to fighting, courage, loyalty to the rulers and an almost fatalistic bravery there is nothing in the German army that surpasses the "Tommies," the French soldier, and the Scottish regiments. It is quite probable that the allies can put more men into the field for the coast battle than Germany, and that they can better equip them with ammunition.

RETREAT A SLAUGHTER.

If the invaders should be turned back and forced to fight every inch of the way to the German frontier, can any one picture the slaughter that would ensue? It would surely be appalling. Discipline in many instances would be impossible, as it was in the retreat of the grand army from Moscow a century ago. Isolated regiments would be cut off and mowed down, bayoneted, or swept with rapid fire pieces. Stragglers would engage in hand to hand encounters to the death. Belgium would be soaked a second time in human blood.

The devastation of Belgium would be completed. The Germans now hold all the principal cities and the fortified towns. They control the railroads, the telegraph, the telephone lines, the approaches to the bridges over the rivers and canals, and all the paved roads for which Belgium is noted.

The cities doubtless would see the hell on earth as it has not been observed up to this time. In the fortified towns the Germans would set up new defences and compel the allies to do one of two things or both—shell them out of the towns or attempt to surround the places and attempt a capture.

Meanwhile, the Belgian people, if they ever get a chance, will make a terrible reprisal on the retreating invaders, and particularly the garrisons now holding the fortified towns. I saw it in Malines, where the beautiful cathedral was smashed by the forty-two centimeter shells, where the town was blown to pieces and burned up in sections, and men, women and children were slain.

I saw 2,000 men in the square, and a German officer's car standing before the commandant's headquarters. They surged up around it, and somewhere in the air the almost inaudible thing called low rumbling, a murmuring, a snarl, could be heard faintly. They were cold and hungry; their homes lay in heaps before their eyes and beside them children moaned for for bread.

FAITH OF BELGIANS.

In Brussels hundreds of Belgians daily get out on the heights, or did a few days ago, to welcome the allies of the Russians. Pathetic is the simple faith of the Belgian noncombatants in the hourly deliverance of their city by the English, or the French, or the Russians. That belief holds them in check. At Antwerp it is the same.

In Ghent the axes and hammers have been taken from the people. If the retreat ever is sounded God alone knows what will happen in these large cities, even Louvain and Tirlemont and Liege. There would be street fighting in every place. It would be hand to hand business more frightful than anything that has gone before.

WAR BUT BEGUN.

In a resisting retreat it would take six months or more to drive the invaders back across Belgium. At the end of that six months, my judgment is, the crows would migrate to some new land in the search of food.

This war has only begun. Its magnitude renders a quick peace entirely improbable. The story has only started, it will be a big book when peace is declared.

DON'T GIVE CONSUMPTION A CHANCE
To Get a Foothold on Your System.

Check the First Sign of a Cold By Using
DR. WOOD'S NORWAY PINE SYRUP.

A cold, if neglected, will sooner or later develop into some sort of lung trouble, so we would advise you that on the first sign of a cold or cough you get rid of it immediately. For this purpose we know of nothing better than Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup. This preparation has been on the market for the past twenty-five years, and those who have used it have nothing but words of praise for its efficacy.

Mr. H. N. Gill, Truro, N.S., writes: "Last January, 1913, I developed an awful cold, and it hung on to me for so long I was afraid it would turn into consumption. I would go to bed nights, and could not get any sleep at all for the choking feeling in my throat and lungs, and sometimes I would cough till I would turn black in the face. A friend came to see me, and told me of your remedy, Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup. I got a bottle of it, and after I had taken it I could see a great change for the better, so I got another, and when I had taken the two bottles my cough was all gone, and I have never had an attack of it since, and that is now a year ago."

Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup is put up in a yellow wrapper; three pine trees the trade mark; and price, 25c and 50c.

NERVES WERE BAD
Hands Would Tremble So She Could Not Hold Paper to Read.

When the nerves become shaky the whole system seems to become unstrung and a general feeling of collapse occurs, as the heart works in sympathy with the nerves.

Mrs. Wm. Weaver, Shallow Lake, Ont., writes: "I doctored for a year, for my heart and nerves, with three different doctors, but they did not seem to know what was the matter with me. My nerves got so bad at last that I could not hold a paper in my hands to read, the way they trembled. I gave up doctoring thinking I could not get better. A lady living a few doors from me advised me to try a box of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, so to please her I did, and I am thankful to-day for doing so, for I am strong, and doing my own work without help."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50 cents per box, 3 boxes for $1.25; at all druggists or dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Strongest Liniment in 100 Years Best For Either Man or Beast

Nothing for Family Use Can Compare With It.

RUB ON NERVILINE

When you have been exposed to wet and cold and your muscles are full of pain, nerves are jumping with neuralgia, then you should have ready at hand a bottle of Nerviline. It robs pain of its terrors, gives relief to all suffering, brings ease and comfort wherever used.

No care or expense has been spared to secure for Nerviline the purest and best materials. It is prepared with a single aim: to restore the sick to health. This cannot be said of the preparation that an unscrupulous dealer may ask you to accept instead of Nerviline, so we warn you it is the extra profit made on inferior goods that tempts the substitutor. Of him beware.

Get Nerviline when you ask for it, then you are sure of a remedy that will cure all aches, strains, swellings, and the pains of rheumatism, neuralgia and lumbago.

In the last hundred years no liniment has been produced that can compare with Nerviline, in strength, in penetrating power or in curative ability.

For nearly forty years it has been Canada's household remedy, and mothers will do well to follow the advice of Mrs. Jessie Beggins, of Stella P. O., Ont., who says.

"Very frequently there are ailments in the family that can be cut short if Nerviline is handy. When my children come in from play with a cough or a bad cold, I rub them well with Nerviline, and they are well almost at once. Nerviline is fine for earache, toothache, chest colds, lumbago, stiffness, rheumatism or neuralgia. In fact there is scarcely a pain or ache in man or beast it won't cure quickly."

The large 50c. family size bottle is the most economical; trial size, 25c.; at all dealers, or the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

FARM AND GARDEN

ALFALFA.

The tenth annual report of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, issued at Ottawa, contains papers and reports on various vital topics in agriculture. Following are statements extracted from papers on alfalfa by Professor C. A. Zavitz, and potato diseases by Mr. H. T. Gussow, Dominion Plant Pathologist.

"The production of hardy alfalfa seed is limited to a small area. The farmers of Haldimand knew that they had a hardy strain of alfalfa. They knew that farmers were "hungry" for a strain that would withstand climatic conditions. But the growers lacked organization; they lacked a selling medium. The District Agricultural Representative put them in touch with the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, and the upshot was the Grand River Alfalfa Seed Centre, having for its object the production and sale of Registered Grimm's Varigated Alfalfa Seed. This circle is selling throughout Canada its home-grown seed, without employing a seed merchant or middleman. The secretary books orders, not for one man, but for the Circle. They have grasped the real principle of co-operation, and are being repaid.

The status of alfalfa in Canada is almost critical at the present time. How important may be the results of such work as that of the Grand River Seed Centre may be inferred from Professor Zavitz' statement that the decrease in alfalfa of over 22,000 acres in one year in Ontario alone, was due to the planting of tender varieties. In no case has the seed of the common variety, obtained from the United States, given satisfactory results. Varieties are wanted such as the Grimm and the Ontario Varigated. Last year, the alfalfa crop was practically annihilated by frost throughout Eastern Ontario. A plot of Ontario Varigated, near Morrisburg, stood the winter well, when all the surrounding fields were killed.

Alfalfa seed can be produced successfully in several places in Ontario, and also in the comparatively Southern Alberta Country. In Ontario, there is no place more suitable for its production than on the rolling clay land extending along the Grand River and eastward through the central part of the Niagara Peninsula. In that country, alfalfa has been grown successfully for more than forty years, and a hardy strain has been developed.

POTATO DISEASES AND REMEDY.

"Plant disease and you will harvest disease," says H. T. Gussow, Dominion Plant Pathologist. The only way to prevent potato diseases from being propagated is to plant sound tubers.

The potato crop is one of Canada's most valuable and necessary crops. There is no other crop that will repay so well a little care and labor spent on it. What is the position of matters? The examination of many hundreds of samples shows it is rare to receive a sample that can be recommended for seed. The situation is serious, and the need for improvement urgent.

Seed treatment does not control diseases of a fungus or bacterial nature such as "powdery scab," "potato canker," "dry rot," "late blight," "fusarium rot," and "bacterial ring" disease. Powdery scab, canker and probably dry rot are visible externally; the others appear only when cutting the tuber.

Potato canker does not exist in Canada. Upon this disease and powdery scab is based the United States potato embargo, recently enforced against Canada.

Some potato diseases, particularly Powdery Scab, may live in the ground for years. Hence, if sound tubers are planted on ground that once produced a diseased crop, the resulting crop will again turn out diseased. In order to protect himself, the grower must familiarize himself with these troubles. No official action will succeed in controlling disease unless the farmer will do his share. Make it a rule to plant only sound potatoes on land that has not produced previously a diseased crop. This is the whole secret.

NOXIOUS WEED SEEDS.

In oats, wild buckwheat, false flax, wild oats and quack-grass.

In rye wild oats, quack-grass, wild buckwheat and mustard.

In medium red clover, lamb's quarters, green foxtail, plantain and curled dock.

In millet, dock, black bindweed, yellow foxtail, fanweed and mustard.—Montana Ex. Station.

NOTES.

Cabbage should not be planted the second year where the first season's crop has shown much clubroot, and potatoes should not follow where scab has prevailed, according to the Geneva, N. Y., Experiment Station; but careful tests in two seasons carried on by the station, have given no evidence that the blight fungus can survive the winter in the field. It would seem unnecessary, then, the Geneva Station concludes, to change the location of the potato crop to avoid this disease, especially as we know that thorough spraying will control both the blight and rot and will increase the crop enough, taking one year with another to make this a highly profitable regular practice in potato planting.

An observing dairyman says that cows off feed are usually the ones with small mouths.

The Pennsylvania Experiment Station concludes, as the result of tests, that the amount of silage fed to the breeding ewes should be limited to two pounds daily per head. Experiments at this station gave proof that feeding corn silage as a whole roughage is fatal to pregnant ewes in a high percentage of cases. For that reason, conclude the experimenters, it should be fed in conjunction with other roughages, as alfalfa or clover hay, allowing two pounds as the maximum amount of corn silage to be fed to the pregnant ewes. Feeding of spoiled silage causes death of lambs.

A cow does not expectorate, as a human being does, and if she has tuberculosis the germs pass in the excrement. Manure falling in the form of dust from the udder into the milk may carry these germs. Keep the udder clean, but do not cleanse it just before milking, or the dust arising may work the damage. Some use a damp cloth, which prevents the stirring of dust. Proper care of the udder will pay.

The Kansas Experiment Station says that for quick results in improving a soil sweet clover is superior to most other crops. Its ability to thrive well on soils lacking in humus or otherwise badly run down makes it especially adapted for this purpose. Like alfalfa, cowpeas and other legumes, it has the ability to obtain nitrogen from the air by means of the plants, thus adding much nitrogen to the soil in which it grows. When plowed under for green manure or allowed to remain on the land this crop is a very efficient one in building up the humus content of the soil. The large roots, which penetrate deeply, break up the lower layers of the soil and add much humus thereto when they decay, thus improving the physical condition of the soil to a considerable depth below the depth of plowing. Sandy as well as heavy clay and hard-pan soils, which would not otherwise produce satisfactory crops, may be so improved in texture by growing sweet clover for a few years that they become quite productive.

Alfalfa responds quickly to applications of barnyard manure. While manure benefits an established stand, the greatest benefit is usually derived by applying manure to the crop preceding alfalfa in the rotation.

ALMOST EVERYONE NEEDS A TONIC

Almost everyone—man, woman and child—needs a tonic at sometime. It is often said that a man is lazy because he takes little or no interest in his work; but the truth he is not well. He needs a tonic. The same is true of the woman who does not bustle over her home work, but only feels fit to be in bed. She is not merely tired, but ill. A dull pain in the head or back, poor appetite, loss of strength with low spirits and loss of interest in life show that you need a tonic to brace up the nerves and give you a new lease of life. The proof is that when the right tonic is taken all the trouble quickly disappears. The one tonic the only tonic—for weak and ailing men, women and children is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which speedily bring back abundant health, strength and energy. They have done this in thousands and thousands of cases as is proved by the following: Mr. Ed. A. Owen, Burdett, Alta., says: "About two years ago my health was in a wretched condition. My whole system seemed to be run down and the doctor seemed puzzled at my condition. I had no appetite, exertion would leave me breathless, and I was troubled much with dizziness. And the medicine I took did me no good and I was steadily growing weaker. My mother urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and before I had taken them very long I began to feel like a new man and continuing their use I was restored to complete health. I now recommend them to all run down in health as they are the best medicine I know of."

WHAT WAR IS.

(Exchange)

The newspapers have many columns devoted to descriptions of different actions in the war, but the following takes the palm for brevity. An English soldier who had been wounded in an engagement was asked to describe what war was like. Jack Frost.

Jack Frost looked forth one still, clear night,
And whispered, "Now I'll be out of sight;
So through the valley and over the height
In silence I'll take my way.
I shall not go like that blustering train,
The Wind and the Snow, the Hail and the Rain,
Who make so much bustle and noise in vain,
But I'll be as busy as they."

Then he flew to the mountains, and powdered its crest;
He lit on the trees, and their boughs he drest
In diamond beads; and over the breast
Of the quivering lake he spread
A coat of mail, that it need not fear
The downward point of many a spear
That he hung on its margin, far and near
Where a rock could rear its head.

He went to the windows of those who slept,
And over each pane like a fairy crept;
Wherever he breathed, wherever he stept,
By the light of the moon, were seen
Most beautiful things; there were flowers and trees;
There were cities with temples and towers—and these
All pictured in silver sheen!

But he did one thing that was hardly fair:
He peeped in the cupboard, and finding there
That all had forgotten for him to prepare—
"Now just to set them a-thinking,
I'll bite this basket of fruit," said he,
"This costly picture I'll burst in three;
And the glass of water they've left for me
Shall 'tchick!' to tell them I'm drinking."

IN THE POULTRY WORLD

TESTING AGE OF EGGS.

There are various ways of testing the age of eggs. An old time method which was often adopted when a "stolen" nest was found, was to put the eggs in a vessel of cold water. On the principle that weight decreased as age increased, it was held that eggs which had been laid several days would float, while any of recent date would go below the surface. All that promptly sank to the bottom were supposed to be good for food. This was an easy method, but unfortunate as a good many people who had faith in it discovered after they had made a few experiments; it was not always reliable. Just why its results were not uniform has never been satisfactorily explained. It often worked out correctly, but sometimes eggs that were very far from good sank in the water. When these eggs were broken the one who was to cook them had not an altogether pleasant surprise.

A prominent poultry journal has just reprinted from a French paper, and without comment, a description of a somewhat similar method of learning the approximate age of eggs, which may work out satisfactorily. This involves the use of salt water, and the eggs to be tested are placed in this solution. A strictly fresh egg is supposed to sink to the bottom and an egg only one day old should go nearly there. If an egg swims it has probably been laid at least three days and one that floats has reached a greater, but entirely problematical age.—A. E. Vandervort.

RATIONS FOR WINTER.

In winter laying, and also in moulting, hens should be fed liberally with feedstuffs containing a high percentage of protein and carbohydrates. Dried blood is richest in protein, for it contains 80 per cent.; green cut bone (one of the very best of egg producers), 20 per cent. Rice contains 79 per cent. of carbohydrates, wheat ground meal with 67 per cent., corn 66 per cent., barley 65 per cent., and oats 57 per cent. of carbohydrates.

How much of green cut bone should a hen get a day? One quarter of an ounce per day, per hen, is quite sufficient. If given more bowel troubles are likely to occur. The best and surest remedy for egg eating is the hatchet. But the next is to take an egg, make a small hole and take some out of its contents, and put some mixture of aloes in the egg, and churn it with a piece of wood, glue up the hole and let the hens peck at it; they will all but like it.

Have the hens lay in a dark place, and have the nests deep, and the straw or hay close to the sides of the box. Also dry egg shells you may have, break them up small, and let them have all you can get. Hens often eat eggs because they cannot get the necessary material for the shells.—Hans Vonberg.

DAMPNESS IS FATAL.

Dampness is fatal in hen houses; drain to promote dryness. Better by far to have a cold dry house than a warm damp one. The warmer the air the more moisture it will hold. When this moist air comes in contact with a cold surface condensation takes place which is often converted into hoar-frost. The remedy, therefore, is to remove the moisture as much as possible by first cutting off the water from below which comes up from the soil. Dirt floors are usually damp. Board floors are short-lived and harbor rats. A cement floor is nearly as cheap as a board floor, is rat proof, cuts off the dampness from below, and if properly put down, will last forever. If covered with straw or soil it makes a warm floor. Make cement floors by filling in with small stones or coarse gravel, if possible, for drainage, then work in and smooth off one or two inches of mortar made by mixing thoroughly while dry, one part good cement to three parts clean sharp sand, then, wetting and thoroughly mixing again.

FATTENING DUCKS.

Mature ducks are easily fattened in in confinement. They require heavy feeding for about three weeks on fairly strong rations. One good ration consists of: Cornmeal, 3 parts by weight; low-grade flour or middlings, 1 part; beef scrap, 3-4 part, and green food, 1 part. This is fed three times a day for the three weeks, with the result of increase in weight as well as improved quality. The beef scrap and green food are important as they have a great influence on proper gain in weight. The actual length of the feeding period must be determined by the condition of the birds. When properly fattened the flesh is of excellent flavor.—M. A. J.

NOTES.

Laying contests have accomplished a good work in bringing before the public the possibilities of the hen as an egg producer, but there is a time coming when the mad rush to break records each year will be overdone. Utility, so-called, can be carried to the same extreme that so-called fanciers have done. There is a limit.

The beginner is often most successful with the breed that takes his fancy. To make persons raise fowls that do not appeal to them is unwise. They must have a real likening for the fowls they raise to be successful.

Again take heed and order the incubator, brooder, eggs for hatching, day-old chicks or stock in time for the proper start. Late hatches are not always the wise thing for especially the beginner to indulge in. The early-hatched chick is apt to be the best profit-payer.

If you are fifty and sort of "settled down," get a feather. Blow it, chase it, keep it going, run it down if you can, keep a-blowing, "make your chimney smoke" until there's not a whiff of bad air in your lungs. When the game's over you'll feel like a frolicsome kitten or a playful baby, and your cares will go floating away in the wake of a feather.

If you are sweet sixteen, "chase the feather" is the game for you. It's faster, than the tango and as jolly and it spells health as well as fun.

No matter who you are, or where you are, the feather game's the game for you. It's light-hearted, light-footed and frisky, and it's a game suited to [illegible] 16, 18 and [illegible] like, there's no [illegible] In the feather chasing game you can blow your goose feather or turkey feather just as hard as you like, the harder you blow the better it will be for your lungs, the nimbler you'll be on your feet, the keener you'll be in your thought dome.

If you want to sidestep the doctors, cheat the insane asylums and the rest cures, grab off a feather, blow it, chase it, get your friends to join in the chase, puff out your cheeks until wrinkles turn to dimples, hop and skip and bend and dip until your muscles are limber as elastic.

The feather game is new, but it's spreading fast and far. They are playing it all over the country. Business men are chasing the feather at lunch hour in the gym; children are prancing around the school yards blowing at the elusive dab of down; doctors are telling their women patients to play the feather game for health and beauty.

The stunt is to toss a feather in the air, and then keep it there by blowing. If you get a room full of guests doing it, each with his own feather, the fun is fast and furious, and the danger to furniture and bric-a-brac adds excitement to the sport.

Color the feathers, so each contestant can distinguish his own, and then offer a prize to the person who keeps his feather longest in the air.

The game is great for everybody from three-year-old to grandma.

IF CATARRH KEEPS YOU HAWKING USE "CATARRHOZONE"-THE QUICKEST CURE

Nothing Known So Sure For Throat Weakness, Bronchial Trouble, Etc.

No doctor attempts to-day to cure a genuine case of catarrh or bronchitis except by the inhalation method. Stomach dosing has been discarded because useless medicine so taken affects only the stomach—never reaches the seat of catarrh.

The advanced physician recognizes that only air can be sent into the lungs and bronchial tubes. Fill this air with healing medicaments and you solve the problem. No combination of antiseptics is so successful as Catarrhozone. It contains the richest pine-balsams and the greatest healers known.

One breath of Catarrhozone instantly circulates over the area that is afflicted with catarrh. Relief is instant—suffering stops at once—germs are destroyed—every taint of disease is removed. Think it over seriously. Here is a remedy that clears the throat relieves hoarseness, coughing and bad breath. Irritating phlegm is cleared out, inflamed bronchial tubes are healed, throat and voice are strengthened.

Catarrhozone is pleasant and certain. You breathe Catarrhozone—you don't take it. Large $1.00 size is guaranteed; smaller size 50c. and trial size 25c at all dealers everywhere.

WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?

Who wanted War?
"I," said the Kaiser,
"With God my adviser,
I wanted War."

Who saw his game?
"We," said the Nations,
"We sat by in patience,
But we saw his game."

Who barred the way?
"I did," said Flanders,
"In spite of his slanders,
I barred the way."

Who spiked his gun?
"Our boys," said Kitchener,
"And now they are ditchin' 'er,
They spiked his gun."

Who stole a march?
"We," said the Frenchies,
"Nous avons les trenches,
We stole a march."

"I know what it means,
I'll toll his knell."

Who'll bear the torch?
"I," said the Hun,
"I've seen how it's done,
I'll bear the torch."

Who'll be chief mourner?
"I," said the Teuton,
"Mein Deutschland ist uber,
I'll be chief mourner."

And every single Hun
Will fall a-sighing and a-sobbing
When he comes to the end
Of his sacking and robbing.

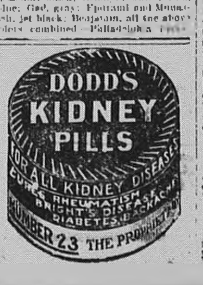
Jewish Flags.

The Zionists adopted a flag made up of a white ground with a blue horizontal stripe on each side and the shield of David in the centre.

In reference to the direction from the book of Numbers, "Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house," the Midrash explains that the emblems and colors corresponded to the twelve precious stones set in the breast plate of the high priest. The colors for the different tribes were as follows: Reuben, red; Simeon, green; Levi, tricolor—white, black and red; Judah, sky blue; Issachar, black; Zebulun, white; Dan, blue; Gad, gray; Ephraim and Manasseh, jet black; Benjamin, all the above colors combined.—Philadelphia Press.



"WAR" WAGED BY GENTLE GERMANS

Awful Barbarities Practised On Some Prisoners

And These Are Told By the Victims Themselves.

The Mayor of Le Mans, where a wounded French soldier, Constant B——, is in hospital, has taken down the following statement from the soldier:

"On Sept. 8 I received a bullet through my right lung. I thought at first I was barely hurt, and went on firing twenty-seven cartridges. Then I swooned and remained behind, my company retreating. On the 11th I was discovered by a German army surgeon. His stretcher bearers picked me up, then stripped me of my money and everything of value I had on. I was then thrown down and left in a half-burnt hovel at Rembercourt (Meuse.) Seven other wounded French soldiers were thrown with me.

"The non-combatant population had been forbidden, under pain of death, to give us any food or attention. Nevertheless, some old men secretly brought us beef tea and coffee. They saved my life. One of them had both his arms broken by a Prussian soldier because he exclaimed 'What a sad thing war is!' My saviours lived in a hole dug out of a half-burnt haystack. At last I was found by a French surgeon. My comrades and I had remained twelve days without our wounds being dressed."

BRUTAL BAVARIANS.

A Parisian schoolmaster writes to his parents an exceedingly dramatic account, published in a provincial newspaper, of how he was taken prisoner in the Vosges, and how, after seeing his comrades shot dead before his eyes and himself receiving a bullet wound in the breast, he managed to crawl back to his own lines.

"They stripped us," he writes, searched us, and broke our rifles. One Bavarian, in a sudden gust of anger, seized his rifle by the muzzle and brought down the butt on the head of one of my fellow-prisoners. Dazed, the poor fellow staggered a few yards, and then fell. A revolver bullet finished him off. A moment later a German non-commissioned officer advanced and putting the point of his sabre to my breast, asked in bad French, 'How many companies are there in the wood?' I answered that I did not know, and he turned away without saying a word. Then we were led off to the fringe of the wood facing us. On the way our captors kicked us, pricked at us with their bayonets, and bludgeoned us with their rifle-butts.

"When we reached the main body of the German troops we found three other French soldiers—two sergeants and a private—who had been captured at the same time and in the same circumstances as we. We shook hands. I noticed that one of the prisoners had a wound in his head, and began to dress it. At this moment up came the officer in command of the Bavarian company. He was foaming with rage. I could see from his gestures that he intended to shoot us. I could also see that the soldiers were interceding in our behalf.

SHOOTING CAPTIVES.

"One of our number, Sergeant S., who knew German, appealed to the officer to spare us. The officer shot him down, and after him the second sergeant, and finally the private. I knew it was to be my turn next. Instinctively I put up my arm in front of my face, crying at the same time, 'Assassin to shoot down prisoners!' I felt a blow in my chest, and a burning sensation, then fell unconscious. After a certain time I recovered consciousness and looked up, but seeing German soldiers around, lay still and shammed death. They came up and kicked me, then, turning me over, searched my pockets. They dragged me for several yards, first by the feet, then by the head. They felt my wound with their fingers and one of them raised my eyelids, saying in French 'Wake up, Mister.' I remained inert and forced back my groans. I heard a voice say, 'The chap is a goner.' Then there was silence.

"I lay unconscious for how long I do not know. Then I opened my eyes again. By this time it was night. I could hear the groans of a dying man near me. I crept towards the sound, and saw Sergeant Y—— in the last agonies of death. The dead bodies of his comrades were round him. I went into the wood, and, leaning against a tree, staunched the blood that was now flowing from my reopened wound with my rain-soaked necktie. Then following the border of the wood, I began to creep towards the spot where I believed the French lines to be. I crawled thus for about two miles. Then, just as I thought I must faint, I found myself at last in the trenches of my own company. I was saved."

APOLOGY

Mr. and Mrs. John Weiler,
Walkerton, Ontario.

I hereby apologize to you and each of you for having given a notice to Joseph M. White, License Inspector of South Bruce, that you were in the habit of drinking liquor to excess and requiring him to serve licensed hotel-keepers in his district with a notice under the Liquor License Act forbidding licensed hotel-keepers in his district to deliver liquor to you under the penalties contained in the Act.

I am sorry for having given this notice as I know the statement that I made in the notice that you and your wife had this habit is false, and I hereby withdraw the accusation made to this effect against you in this notice.

Dated this 22nd day of January 1915.

J. Schmidt,

WITNESS
Herb Fortney.

County Council

The January session of the Bruce County Council was concluded on Friday last. Besides the business transacted as reported last week, the following items of business were carried out on Thursday and Friday.

Communications were read from the officers of the Belgian Relief Fund and the Red Cross Society thanking the Council for the liberal grants made to these funds at the December Session.

Messrs W. J. Taylor and H. McLaren were reappointed Municipal Auditors.

Messrs McNab and N. Robertson were reappointed Auditors of Criminal Justice Accounts.

N McGillivary; for Chesley "
C. J. Mickle; for Wiarton "
T. A. Pickard; for Kincardine "
A. M. Smith.

The usual grants were made of $75 to each Agricultural Socy; $25 to each Farmers and Women's Institute; $5 to each Rural School Library having at least 100 volumes where the moneys before voted for this purpose have been applied to the purchase of books only; $15 to each Public Library having under 1500 volumes and $30.00 to each library having 1500 volumes or over. A change was made as to payment of these grants none of which will be paid before the 15th of November. Treasurers will kindly note this and so save much useless correspondence.

The question of a grant for Patriotic purposes was before the council. There appeared no difference of opinion about a grant but the amount and application raised some discussion. The Finance Committee brought in a report on this that while they believed this prosperous County should contribute one mill on the dollar. They recommended that one half mill be raised this year and leave it to next year's council to raise another half mill next year if required. This report was adopted $10 000 of this amount to go to the Canadian Patriotic Fund, $2500 to the Canadian Red Cross Fund, and the balance to the Belgian Relief Fund, the amount to the Patriotic Fund to be paid in 10 equal monthly instalments commencing in March, and the Red Cross and Belgian amounts to be paid quarterly.

Messrs D. Robertson K.C., and H. M. Lay of Walkerton, were present and Mr. D Robertson introduced Mr. Ames M.P., of Montreal, Hon. Sec'y of the Patriotic Fund, who explained the objects and working of this fund, showing how it was used to maintain the families of the soldiers at the front and how this was done through local Committees where the different families reside so the local men could see just what each family required, how many in it and all about it. In this way each family got its proper share and the cost of administering the fund reduced to a minimum.

Judge Barrett wrote the Council asking that a court stenographer be appointed as the trial of cases was much delayed by not having one and cases could not be nearly as well tried. The saving to County in fees of juries, witnesses and others would more than amount to the salary. The council appointed a committee to arrange this and an appointment was made at a salary of $200.

Mr. Keeling, of Southampton Continuation School, and Mr. Kidd of Mildmay School, were appointed on the Board of Examiners.

The usual grants to assisted schools were made.

Messrs Nesbitt and Phelan asked that a foot bridge be built on the Cargill bridge but council declined to do so as other bridges in which County is interested have not such walks.

The usual grant of $300 was made to four northern Tps, on motion of Messrs Forbes and Munn.

A grant of 25c. per day was made to each member of a local company drilling at company headquarters, not to exceed $3 per man.

Mr. Whicher of Albermarle claimed his township was over assessed and asked to have the matter adjusted. The question will be considered.

The goal surgeon reported that the Turnkey was seriously ill and required an operation. As this appeared to be part of the responsibilities of the County this was authorized.

The report of the Keeper and Physician of the House of Refuge showed 83 inmates and that the average cost per week of each person last year was $1.02. The report of the Physician and House Committee, complimented Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, the Keeper and Matron, for the manner in which they Were discharging their duties.

The council heard with regret of the death of His Honor Judge Barrett. All the members were more or less acquainted with him and many and deep were the expressions of regret heard on every side. A committee was appointed to convey the condolences of the council to Mrs. Barrett and the family.

The council concluded its work on Friday and adjourned to meet in Kincardine on Monday the 31st May next at 7.30 p.m.

P. A. MALCOMSON,
County Clerk.

TAKEN TO CENTRAL

John Lazure who was recently sentenced to one year in Central by Judge Klein on a charge of horse-stealing, was taken to Toronto by Constable Briggs on Saturday.

100 YEARS OF PEACE.

In all the churches throughout Canada, the services on Sunday next will be devoted to the celebration of a century of Peace between Canada and the United States.

TOOK A STROKE.

Mrs. Jas. Wilson, of Brant, suffered a paralytic stroke at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Wm Long, on Wednesday of last week. Mrs. Wilson's many friends will be pleased to learn that she is recovering.

ILL WITH PNEUMONIA

Isabella, the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. O. Klein, has for some days been under the care of the doctors and a trained nurse, suffering from pneumonia. We are pleased to state that the youngster is now recovering.

SENT UP FOR TRIAL

Oliver Cole of Southampton who is charged with securing money under false pretenses, was committed for trial by Magistrate Tolton on Thursday and will appear for a hearing before Judge Klein this week. Cole is at present out on bail

MADE ASSIGNMENT.

Mr. Dave Karges who has been conducting the East End Bakery for the past year has made an assignment to the former proprietor of the bakery, Mr. A. Helm, who will in future conduct the business. Mr. Karges has rented Mr. T. E. Attwood's residence on Durham st. and moved there on Tuesday.

WON FIRST PRIZE

The fourteenth annual public speaking contest at the O. A. C. was held Friday evening in the gymnasium of the college and as usual drew a very large crowd and was a delightful affair. Mr. S. G. Freeborn formerly of the local office of the Department of Agriculture, was awarded the coveted Rettie-Clemens prize for his excellent address on "The Book Farmer."

TOWN HOCKEY

Three hockey matches were played at the rink on Saturday afternoon. The first games between the youngsters of Slabtown and a team from another section of the town, resulted in a win for the former by 6-3. After this game the Printers defeated the High School by 9-5 and McCartney's Pets or the Sons of Rest then trimmed the Dobbin Factory team after a strenuous game to the tune of 5-3.

BREAD AT 14c

Since the outbreak of the war the prices of all foodstuffs has been steadily advancing and during the past week the local bakers have found it necessary to boost the price of bread for a second time and the price per loaf now is fourteen cents. The bakers were compelled to make this advance by the steady rise in the price of wheat and flour, wheat now bringing $1.60 per bushel.

Lace curtain sale, one pair to design. Worth $2. to $6.00 a pair; now half price.—Stephan Bros.

The Merchant who trifles with "Grocery Quality" for an immediate "Money Gain" has a short road to travel over and a rough one—In everything we sell our "Aim is Quality" and as usual, at the lowest prices.—Goode & McKay.

SALE OF PURE BRED CATTLE

The Provincial Sale of Pure Bred Cattle (beef breds) will be held in the Winter Fair building Guelph on Wednesday, 3rd March 1915. At this sale will be offered some forty head of Durham cattle, mostly Bulls and among them many fashionably bred animals. Sale to begin at one o'clock sharp. For further particulars apply to C. L. Lollee, President, or J. M. Duff, Secretary.

SHIPMENT OF CARS

Messrs Hunstein & Kalbfleish, of Mildmay, who are starting a garage in the building opposite the town hall received a shipment of Ford cars, for which they have the agency, last week and are endeavoring to dispose of them. Owing to the prevailing financial depression it is generally considered that the automobile agency business this year will be decidedly dull, as compared with years gone by.

BANKERS DEFEATS H. S.

The High School hockey team was defeated on Tuesday afternoon by the Bankers, the score after forty-minutes play being 10-0 in favor of the Financiers. The line up:—

CASE ADJOURNED

Jack Fisk, of Greenock, an Indian lister, appeared before magistrate Richardson on Wednesday afternoon on a charge of being under the influence of liquor which was laid against him by Inspector White. There were many witnesses called and the case took up most of the afternoon, but the case was not completed an adjournment being made for a week. A. E. McNab appeared on behalf of the defendant while O. Klein looked after the interests of the prosecution.

MRS. BUNDY'S LUNCHEON

The following item was clipped from the Toronto Star of Saturday: -Mrs. J. Wesley Bundy Walmer Road Hill, was hostess of a luncheon yesterday with Mrs. G. G. S. Lindsey, president of the Toronto Women's Liberal Association, as guest of honor. Covers were laid for 11, those present being Mrs. N. W. Rowell, Mrs. A. W. MacDougald of Montreal, Mrs. J. A. MacDonald, Mrs. Duncan MacDougald and her visitor Mrs. McMartin of Cornwall, Mrs. Philip Gilbert, Mrs. David Dunlap, Mrs. David MacLaren, Mrs. George Ball, Mrs. Knox, Miss Goldsmith, [illegible] of Walkerton.

A FAMO[illegible]W

During [illegible] month of December the records of 1[illegible] cows and heifers were received and entered into the record of performance. Ladysmith Daisy places Vancouver Island in the lead with the largest years' milk record of any cow yet qualified in this test. Her 25,5[illegible] lbs milk and 901.25 lbs butter are indications of what can be done with good Holsteins in favorable climate of British Columbia. Ladysmith Daisy was raised by Mr. Abram Rowand of Walkerton who still has in his possession the mother of this world famed cow.

SOLD GREENHOUSE

Mr. N. M. Critchison, one of Walkerton's florists has disposed of his greenhouse to Mr. J. Hahn of Hanover who we understand intends moving the buildings in connection to Hanover where he will commence business as a florist. Mr. Critchison has accepted the position of manager of several large greenhouses in Berlin and in company with Mrs. Critchison leaves for his new home on March 1st. Since coming to Walkerton, Mr. and Mrs. Critchison have made many friends and they will be much missed, particularly in musical circles of the town, the former having been choirmaster in the Methodist church and the latter soloist in the Knox church.

$20 AND COSTS

Mr. Jack Gillen of Carrick appeared before Magistrate Tolton on Wednesday morning and being found guilty of being drunk while on the prohibitory list, was fined $20 and costs or 30 days in gaol. As he did not have the necessary cash he will remain in castle McKechnie until his fine is paid. Mr. Gillen who has been on the list for some time went to Listowel on Tuesday and purchased four quart bottles of whiskey and naturally on his arrival here on the night train he was intoxicated. He was later found lying in a snow-bank near the G. T. R. depot and would probably have frozen to death, had the good Samaritan stunt not been repeated, by a passerby who chanced to see him.

WILL CARRY ON BUSINESS.

Mrs. Porteous will carry on the millinery business formerly conducted by her daughter, the late Miss Louise Porteous, and has engaged a leading milliner and trimmer for the coming season, and solicits your patronage.

TOWN COUNCIL.

The regular meeting of the town council was held on Monday evening. Other than the ordinary routine work very little business was transacted, the only item worthy of mention being that the council decided to levy ¼ of a mill on the tax rate, for the maintenance of the public library.

LISTOWEL HERE MONDAY.

Having won the district honors, the Walkerton hockey team now enter the semi-finals in the N.H.L. competetion. It was at first expected that the locals would play the first round of the semi-finals with Winston, but as that team is playing games in the O. H. A. this and next week, the executive of the Northern League decided that Listowel and Walkerton should play off and the first game will be played here on Monday evening next and the return game in Listowel on Wednesday. The boys are determined to clean-up on the Listowel aggregation and Monday's fixture will be a hummer. Turn out and help the Colts win their first semi-final game.

AFTER HIS SCALP

The Herald and Times last week, came out flat-footedly in condemnation of the action of Registrar McFarlane in dismissing his deputy and is out after the scalp of that official. Our contemporary's action in taking up the cudgels against the Registrar is commendable and in his article he spoke in no uncertain manner. The Herald-Times being the chief Conservative organ in South Bruce, gives rise to the question, "Is that paper's opposition to the Registrar, who was appointed by the Conservative government in the best interests of the party?" Without hesitation we say that it is, for the Times could not afford to allow such an episode to pass unnoticed, particularly when a public servant of Mr. McKay's type and standing in the business life of the town, has been dismissed. In this matter the editor of the Time's has behind him almost every Conservative voter in South Bruce.

DISTRICT DEPUTY HERE.

Mr. F. Ryan, of Paisley, who is district deputy of the No 5 district A. F. & A. M., paid his official visit here on Tuesday evening. There were visiting brethren here from Hanover, Cargill and Teeswater. Mr. Ryan expressed himself as being exceptionally pleased with the work put on at the sitting of the lodge. And evidently Mr. Ryan is the right man in the right place. As he gave a most excellent address at the close of the work which all the brethren very much enjoyed. The meeting in the hall was closed by the Junior Warden inviting all the brethren to a banquet which was served by The Red Cross young ladies of Walkerton at their Tea Room, on Durham Street. It is only fair to the young ladies to say that they certainly deserve great credit for the splendid menu they served, in fact it is some time since it was equaled in Walkerton. After the repast there were the usual toasts which were responded to by a number of the visitors and all dispersed after having spent a very pleasant and profitable evening.

THAT WITHDRAWAL!

In another column of this paper is a withdrawal of several statements which were made in the Telescope last week when commenting on the summary dismissal of Mr. Geo. D. McKay from the office of Deputy Registrar by his senior, Mr. W. H. McFarlane. We considered that in this item we were voicing public opinion and to what extent this is correct remains to be seen by future developements. In the history of Walkerton no action of a public offical has created such a sensation as that of Mr. McFarlane and if he survives as Registrar the wave of public resentment which has risen against him on this occasion it will be a great surprise. Although we made no comment on the Registrar's public life, made no attack upon his character, or mentioned not his standing as a citizen of Paisley where he spent many years, he rushed to law and had us served with a notice of complaint. This procedure, however, will in no way assist Mr. McFarlane in overcoming public sentiment against him. His quarrel is not with us, but he will have to answer for his deeds to the general public whose opinion this journal attempts to express.

MARRIED

TAYLOR-McPHAIL.—In Walkerton on Wednesday, February 10th, Mr. H. Taylor, of Mildmay, to Miss Cora McPhail, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Zine, McPhail

ROUTLEDGE-CONDY.—At the home of the bride's parents, in Greenock, on Wednesday, February 10th, Miss Edith Condy, second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jos. Condy, to Mr. John E. Routledge, of Brant.

PURCHASED STOCK.

Mr. A. J. Smith, a former Walkerton Merchant has purchased the stock of general merchandise of J. Pleskey who made an assignment recently. Mr. Smith will open the store in the course of a few days.

WITHDRAWAL

We have been served with a notice by Mr. W. H. McFarlane, complaining of the article that appeared in last week's Telescope headed "Dismissed his Deputy". Both Mr. McFarlane and his Deputy are Public officers and therefore the matter was a legitimate subject for discussion in a public journal. We have no desire to do Mr. McFarlane any wrong and on reading over the article we observe some parts that had better been left out. In referring to Mr. McFarlane's action we stated "which was carried out like a thief in the night, under cover and in an under-hand manner" and "without giving notice to Mr. McKay, the Registrar went to Toronto, had a new deputy, Mr. McCallum of Toronto, sworn in and on Saturday handed Mr. McKay his dismissal papers." The first words were hyperbolical and were written while the writer felt warm at the summary dismissal of Mr. McKay. We did not mean and we do not think our readers understood us to mean Mr. McFarlane acted in the matter "Like a thief in the night" and we withdraw the above remarks. As we now understand the facts, they are that Mr. McKay was dismissed on Saturday afternoon and Mr McCallum, of Toronto, arrived in Walkerton on Monday forenoon and performed the duties of the Office and signed his name as Deputy Registrar on Monday afternoon, from which we inferred there had been a previous engagement.

Communication

Brant Ratepayer Wants to Know:—

First—At the Brant Council meeting held at the Township Hall on Monday February 1st., when the business of appointing an Assessor was being discussed, did Councillor Findlay call to one side, one of the four rejected applicants, and give his reason for supporting Mr. Bierworth the Bentinck township applicant, because he owed him fifty dollars, and in order to get square he had to support the Bentinck man?

Second—Did Councillor Monto admit to our ermere that he had promised Mr. Bierworth to support his application, but never thought for a moment that he would get the appointment, or in other words that he did not expect the other members of the Council to support his man?

Third—Is it the intention of Reeve Nesbitt and Councillor Rowand to sit with folded arms, and allow work of such questionable character, that has been pulled off in the early stages of the present Council. These are questions of public concern, and must be answered?

I would have thought that Councillor Findlay, who was only elected by the skin of his teeth would have learned how to hang up his coat before starting out to run the whole works. His first big stunt was to have the Township current account transferred from the Canadian Bank of Commerce to the Royal Bank at Elmwood, and his trumped up excuse for this move was that the Royal Bank was paying taxes in Brant, and that huge sum turns out to be about three or four dollars, and only a business tax at that, small business I fancy.

Then at meeting number two, we find the all-wise Findlay, supporting a township of Bentinck man for Assessor in the face of four applications from Brant, any of whom would have been a credit to the township as well as to themselves.

Now for deputy reeve Willoughby, who unlike his friend Findlay, was elected to his seat in the council by a very large majority, and no doubt thinks that he can afford to do some things that are questionable. I would say to Mr. Willoughby that in his great strength lies his very weakness. Mr. Willoughby seems to be strongly opposed to anything in any shape or form going in the direction of Walkerton. In the first place we find him opposed to holding the nomination at Walkerton and next he votes against Alex McNab for the Wardenship then he votes to have the June session of the County Council held at Kincardine: of course, I could not blame him much for that, as it is not often a fellow gets a chance to have a little picnic at the County's expense.

Again he votes to have the township bank account taken from Walkerton to Elmwood, and last but not least, we find him linked up with Councillors Findlay and Monto going to the township of Bentinck for the Assessor which is most humiliating to the ratepayers of Brant, and an insult to the Brant gentlemen who were applicants for the position, and a disgrace to those who were responsible for such conduct, and we are led to believe that the worst is yet to come.

Mr. Editor, I thank you for the above space in your valuable paper.

Frank Rennie

HAS APPENDICITIS

M[illegible], the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Shaw, has been confined to her bed for some days suffering from a severe attack of appendicitis. An operation has not been performed, but latest reports state that the little Miss is somewhat improved although she is not yet out of danger.

CARD OF THANKS

Mrs. Porteous and daughter, Mrs. Devereau desire to express their gratitude to their friends and neighbor for the many kindnesses shown them during their recent bereavement caused by the death of their daughter and sister, Miss Louise Porteous.

COMMUNICATION

Editor Telescope:

Will you kindly allow space in your valuable paper for a few words in regard to the unemployed in Walkerton

While almost every municipality throughout the Dominion is striving to solve this important question, what do we find taking place, in our town? One of our local hotels, is taking advantage of the hard time by importing men from another town to do their painting and decorating

Now Mr. Editor, in my humble opinion, this is to say the least, a very poor way to build up our town. Surely our local men who are raising and educating their families in our schools and also paying their share of the town taxes, are entitled to the patronage of the citizens of the town, yes sir, and the same hotel not excepted, and as these gentlemen have to depend entirely upon the patronage of the public in general for their living you would naturally expect them to patronize the home man. But then as everybody knows our local decorators are not of that variety of men that contribute very much to the upkeep of the local bar, consequently we find the proprietors of the hotel sending their money out of town thereby depriving the butcher, the baker and the grocer out of that money that otherwise would have been spent with them.

Thanking you, Mr. Editor, for your valuable space.

I am yours for a square deal,

OBSERVER.

HOCKEY

By winning the two last games of schedule the Walkerton "Colts" have the district honors of this group of the Northern League and now enter the semi-finals.

Port Elgin 5 - Walkerton 10

On the game played here on Wednesday evening last between Port Elgin and Walkerton the local won by 10 goals to 5. This game was expected to be a strenuous, hard-fought contest, but the Port septette proved to be somewhat of a disappointment to the spectators, the Colts, playing them off their feet in the first period and at half time the score stood 8-1. The local boys, however, let up on their aggressive playing in the second period and this made the play more even, Port securing four goals to Walkerton's two. While each of the locals played a strong game, the playing of Harvey Oberle is deserving of special mention, he being the star on the ice. For the Port Elgin team Stephenson was the best man.

The teams lined up:—

Walkerton		Port Elgin
LaFrance	goal	Hendry
Taylor	r defence	Currier
Rife	l "	Geddes
Oberle	rover	Stephenson
Oberle	centre	Black
Oberle	l wing	Thompson
Ronstadtler,	r wing	Stanton

Referee—A McCartney, Judge of play Dr. Powers.

Mildmay 5 - Walkerton 9.

The last game of the schedule was played at Mildmay on Friday last and the local boys journeyed to the southern burg, accompanied by the usual large number of fans, determined to win. Referee Hockey of Listowel, started the game at 8.45 and the Mildmay fans went wild with enthusiasm when their boys scored the first goal after about ten minutes play. Their exultation however, was short-lived for the Colts soon retaliated scored, one, two and three in rapid succession. The Mildmay puck-chasers failed to locate the nets again in the first period while the locals made the score 8-1 before the gong sounded. In the second half the Mildmay sepette played a more strenuous game and succeeded in netting four goals to Walkerton's one which made the full-time score 9-5

Walkerton winning this game put Mildmay on the shelf without a win to their credit, Southampton giving them two games by default and gave the district honors to the Colts. The final standing of the team in this district:

	Won	Lost
Walkerton	5	1
Port Elgin	5	2
Mildmay	2	4
Southampton	1	5

* won by default from Southampton.

TRUE TO HIS RACE

CHAPTER XXVII.

And since "'tis only noble to be good," the young Earl of Wellrose was noble in the best and highest sense of the word, for he was good—and not only good, but wise and brave.

So thought poor Benjamin Hurst, as he gazed upon his unknown brother and generous benefactor, with a heart too full of gratitude for words.

"This is the third day of this month. The regiment is expected to sail on the first of the next month. You will have four weeks for preparation—ample time; and if I can give you any assistance in any shape, I am very heartily at your service," said Lord Wellrose very cordially.

"My lord," faltered Benny, in a voice choked with emotion, and with eyes full of tears, "I cannot express the thanks that fill my heart to breaking. Oh, my good lord, I am not worthy of your goodness, and if you knew all my past life you would not think me fit to fill the honorable position your generosity would obtain for me! I do wish to enter the army, but I am only fit to be a common soldier, and scarcely fit for that; for what honest soldier would consort, if he knew it, with a returned convict? Not one. Ah, no! ah, no! my woeful past can never be blotted out," said Benny, burying his face in his hands and groaning deeply.

The young earl laid his hand affectionately on the outcast's shoulder and said:

"Your past life of bitter wrong and unmerited shame can and shall be blotted out. You are but a youth still. You shall begin life anew from this day. You are true, honest, courageous and very intelligent. You have educated yourself under difficulties that might well have discouraged the firmest heart. In the midst of undeserved degradation you have prepared yourself for an honorable career, and you shall have it," said the earl with much emotion.

"Oh, my lord, my lord, you overwhelm me with your goodness! But still I must tell you that you do not know all of my past life. If you did you would never think me a fit——" Benny's voice broke down.

"My boy, I do know all your past life, and I pronounce you blameless in it all; and I have nothing but sympathy and compassion, and friendly forgetfulness, to bestow upon it," said the earl, kindly.

"Oh, Lord Wellrose, there is something behind that you do not know, and that you must be told before you get this ensign's commission for me, and throw me into the company of gentlemen," said Benny.

"Well, well, my dear boy, if there be any circumstance connected with your past life with which you think I am not acquainted, and which you wish to tell me, speak now, understanding, however, that it will make no difference in my views and purposes toward you."

"Ah, Lord Wellrose, you think you know the worst, but you do not. You know, indeed, that I was brought up among thieves and beggars, and taught to do their deeds."

"You were not to be blamed, but very much to be pitied for that misfortune."

"You know that I was tried for burglary and convicted, and sent to the penal colonies, where I passed fourteen years in the company of felons."

"I know that you were most cruelly and unjustly convicted, and that you passed your time there blamelessly, doing your appointed work, and using every opportunity for self-improvement, and that you educated yourself in the face of the most appalling obstacles. Yes, I know all that. What more as I to be told as 'the worst?'"

"My lord, you know that I was the companion of thieves, that I was a convict; but you do not know that before all that I was——" Benny's voice broke down, so that he could scarcely go on. "I was—the child of sin and shame, nameless and abandoned from my birth."

The earl took the outcast's hand and held it affectionately, while he gravely replied:

"I know the whole story—as far as anyone knows it—as far, even, as you know it yourself. The sin and the shame were not yours—not yours," he repeated.

"No, not mine," sighed Benny, "but yet the penalty and the punishment must fall on me, in common honor, whether you can properly purchase a commission for me that will put me in the company of gentlemen—whether these gentlemen, if they knew my antecedents, would not demand my expulsion from among them?"

"My dear Benjamin, if they should know your antecedents without knowing your true character—if they should know your penal sufferings without knowing your perfect guiltlessness—no doubt their judgment would be harsh and their actions severe. But since they cannot know the whole, they shall not know a part. Half truth is always so deceptive! They shall know nothing of your past, Benjamin. It is, in fact, none of their business."

"Ah, Lord Wellrose, my very name—my name, which has figured so much in the police reports connected with this murder—my name would betray me!" said Benny, despondingly.

"I have been thinking of that, and have been providing for it," said the earl.

Benjamin looked up inquiringly.

"The name you bear, that of Benjamin Hurst, is not your own."

"No," said the poor outcast, sadly, "I have not even a legal right to the name I bear, since I am not the son of Magdalene Hurst; nor have I even a Christian right to it, since I have never been baptized."

"Then give it up. Cast it off with the slough of your past life. Begin your new life with a new name—a name that I will give you, if you will accept it at my hands—a right noble old name, too, my family name—Seton Douglas! And Heaven knows that you may have a natural, if not a legal right to it, for, though my dear father is a sort of saint, yet I have heard that there have been some wild men in our family. What do you say to the name Benjamin?"

Benny had turned pale as death. In his secret soul he had lately believed that he was a disowned or unknown relative of that family, and he had longed with a hopeless, unuttered longing, to bear that very name.

"Oh, Lord Douglas nothing on earth that you could bestow on me would make me so happy and so grateful as the possession of that name. I will never do anything to dishonor it!" he said.

"I am very sure that you will not. So, as you have never been baptized, we will go to church some day and have you baptized and registered as Benjamin Seton Douglas. And when your commission shall be purchased, as it shall be in a day or two, you will enter Her Majesty's service as Ensign Seton Douglas. And now I must leave you for the present. God bless you!" said the earl, rising to go.

"One moment, my lord. I distrust myself sadly. Have I education enough to do the duties of an ensign? I know nothing whatever of military tactics," said Benny, modestly.

"You have education enough. You do not require to know much of military tactics to be an ensign. And even if you did, the drill sergeant of your company would soon instruct you. But the duty of an ensign is very simple—just to bear the colors of his company. Besides—bless us!—do you suppose that half the young gentlemen who receive commissions in the army have graduated at military academies? By no means. Not a tenth part of them. They have to go into camp or garrison and be drilled by a sergeant. And some of them are too lazy, stupid, and careless to learn. You are neither, I am sure, so take heart of grace," said the earl smiling happily as he left the room, leaving Benny also happier than he had ever been in his life.

Lord Wellrose, since he had seen so much of Benjamin, and noticed the extraordinary likeness the poor outcast bore to himself, the earl, and heard so much of his early history, became gradually convinced of some unknown or unacknowledged relationship existing between them.

"I feel sure that the poor boy is our cousin in some degree—perhaps in a very near degree. He may be our first cousin. At all events, since he has been so cruelly abandoned, and bitterly wronged, I will do what I can to repair his injuries and atone for the sins of his parents," he thought, as he entered his cab and gave the order:

"To Cheviot House."

He thought of speaking to his mother of Benjamin's sad story. Ah! if he only had done so! But the subject was a delicate one for him to broach, and so, upon reflection, he abandoned the idea.

The next morning the Earl of Wellrose set about the business that was so dear to his heart. His name, influence and wealth soon effected his object that in two days more he had the happiness of placing in his protege's hand the document that commissioned him as Ensign Benjamin Seton Douglas, in Her Majesty's —— regiment of foot. He received his commission on the sixth of the month, with orders to join his regiment on the twenty-first.

The same day Benjamin called by appointment on Suzy. This was the first occasion upon which he had seen her since her brother's death and deathbed confession, and his own consequent release from prison.

Suzy received him in a plainly-furnished little sitting-room. She had never occupied the gay and beautiful rose parlors since the death of her brother. She was dressed in deep mourning, and it may have been that the intense blackness of her dress made her face appear even paler than it was, for it seemed marble white now.

She advanced to meet her visitor very kindly, saying softly:

"Oh, Benny, I am so rejoiced that you are free, and fully vindicated! Oh, my dear boy, when I think of the sacrifice you were about to make for me—more than the sacrifice of your life—when I think of how you meant to die with a load of unmerited ignominy on your memory for my sake, to save my brother's life and my name from reproach, oh, Benny, I think that I and all my fame and all my fortune, if I could give all to you, would be too little to repay you! But you are vindicated and released. Oh, I rejoice, and thank God that you are, my brother! my dearest brother!" she said, taking both his hands and pressing them to her heart.

"Dear Suzy, it is very sweet to hear you say this—very sweet and comforting. But, little sister, I cannot fully rejoice in my freedom, since it has come at such a cost to you," said the young man, with emotion, as he took the seat she offered him.

"Don't, Benny, don't say that. It is best as it is. Since my poor, misguided brother had the misfortune to do that fatal deed that made him a fugitive from justice, and left you to suffer unjustly in his place, it is best—oh, so much best—as it is! Think, Benny, deep as my sorrow is for the sudden loss of my poor brother, how much deeper it must have been had you suffered death in his stead, for his deed! Think what my anguish and despair must have been, to have discovered that when it was too late! Benny, the knowledge would have sent me to my grave, or to a lunatic asylum. It is best as it is. This I can bear. I have the comfort of knowing, through his deathbed confession, that he did not intentionally commit murder. The man Fitzroy richly deserved to be knocked down by the brother of the woman whom he had insulted and traduced. But his death was as much an accident as if he had fallen down. My brother was guiltless of intentional homicide; and you are vindicated and released. It is best as it is. And now, let us talk of something else—of your new name and your commission. Ensign Douglas, I congratulate you!" she said, with a smile, as she offered him her hand.

He took the little hand and pressed it to his lips.

"Oh, my dear Benny, I am so glad for your sake!" she continued, now speaking earnestly. "I honor the Earl of Wellrose even much more than I ever did before, for his appreciation of and kindness to you. You are going out as an ensign; come back as a general, Benny! And then, who knows but it may be, 'Rise up, Sir Benjamin Douglas!' Stranger things have happened," she said with a smile.

Benny laughed.

"All cannot rise like you, dear Suzy. I shall do my best; but I never expect to rise higher than a lieutenancy, at the very most," he said. "But now, dear sister of my heart, tell me of your own plans and purposes. Lord Wellrose told me that you intended to go out to Australia. Do you still really mean to take that long voyage?"

"Yes, Benny. I have never been there, you know. And I have not seen my parents since they went there, four years ago. It seems a long time. I must go now to see my father and mother, and try to comfort them for the loss of my brother. They are growing old now, Benny," she added sadly.

"How long shall you be absent, Suzy?" enquired the young man.

"Many months—perhaps a year or more, Benny," she said, growing very serious. "Benny, my brother, my brother, who would have died for my sake Benny, I will tell you a secret. I am going out to Australia, it is true, to see and to comfort my aged father and mother. But, Benny, I shall stay out there to give the Earl of Wellrose time to forget me. This is my secret."

Benjamin looked at her in unbounded astonishment.

"Yes," she said, smiling sadly, "I know what you are thinking of, my brother. You are thinking how, a little while ago, I was nearly breaking my heart about the Earl of Wellrose. Very true, Benny; but that was because, while I loved and honored him so much, and while he visited me every day, I had no assurance from him that he loved or respected me, or had any good intentions toward me. Your timely interference, delicately conducted as such a thing possibly could be, brought matters to a crisis. The earl came and told me that he loved me, and that he wished to make me his wife just as soon as he could obtain his father's and his mother's consent. That it would take time and reason to gain this; but after waiting a reasonable time for their consent, if they should still withhold it, he should feel not only free to marry me without their consent, but also bound in honor, as well as drawn by love, to do so."

"He is a pure and noble soul!" said Benny, with enthusiasm, though not without a natural pang at seeing how utterly Suzy was lost to his hopes forever.

"Yes," said the young girl, warmly, "he is indeed a pure and noble soul. His words made me very happy, so happy that I forgot myself, so happy that I allowed him to place a betrothal ring on my finger and to bind himself to me forever. He had selected it that morning, and brought it to put upon my finger as the pledge of his faith, so that I might never doubt him again. See, here is the ring. I could show you the motto on it, only I do not wish to draw it from my finger. This motto is, 'In truth,'" she said, holding out her hand and exhibiting a pure

"No, certainly—if you marry the earl," said Benny.

"I shall never marry the earl," said the young girl very gravely. "And that brings me back to what I was about to say of my motives. For a little time I was very happy in the earl's love—forgetting that I was unfit to be his wife."

solitaire diamond of priceless value, plainly set in a heavy gold circle.

"I have noticed it before, though I did not know it was the earl's gift. It is a gem of the purest water, I should judge. And I notice that you have not lately worn any other ring."

"Never! For love of this ring, I have discarded all others from my hand, even the rich ruby ring that I liked so much because it was the gift of the Empress of Russia, and she is such a lovely lady. I sang before her majesty three times in the Opera House of St. Petersburg. I shall never sing on any stage again," said Suzy with a sigh.

"Unfit to be his wife, Suzy!" echoed the young man, who, in his own blind and passionate love, believed her fit to be a king's wife.

"Yes," she said calmly, "for he is the Earl of Wellrose, and he will be the Duke of Cheviot. And I am the daughter of a poor stage carpenter, and only by accident elevated to be a popular opera singer. I do not blame his family for objecting to me; for, though in my silly vanity I once boasted that actresses and opera singers had often been raised by marriage to the peerage, yet I know now that this has been but seldom so, and that these cases were very exceptional ones, by no means to be taken as precedents or examples. I know that I, the poor stage carpenter's daughter, developed into an opera singer, am not fit to be a countess now and a duchess hereafter. The very idea terrifies me."

"But I thought you were happy and contented in the earl's love," said Benny, simply.

"And so I was—very happy and confident in the earl's love; deliriously happy and confident. But the awful events of the last few weeks have sobered me down, and brought me to my senses, Benny—have made me remember that it is not fit I should marry the earl and bring discord into his family. Oh, yes, I honor the earl as much as ever—as much as ever! Ah, Heaven truly knows I honor him more than ever! And my soul is satisfied with the knowledge of his esteem for me. And it is this satisfaction which gives me strength to make a sacrifice for his sake—to renounce him for his own good. I will not shock or wound him by giving him up suddenly. But I will go out to Australia, as in duty bound, to visit and console my poor old father and mother. And I will stay out there until absence shall have broken the force of habit, and the Earl of Wellrose shall have forgotten his indiscreet love for the lowly-born opera singer."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The month slipped swiftly away, and the day approached when Ensign Douglas must leave London to join his regiment at Southampton.

Benjamin went to take leave of Suzy the day before he was to start.

"Our parting is not to be here, my dear, you know. I shall go down to Southampton by the same train with yourself, in order to present the colors to your company. And I shall remain at Southampton until your regiment sails," said the young girl, as she kindly took the young soldier's hand.

Benjamin's face lighted up with pleasure.

"Then I shall see you occasionally for the next ten days?" he said, eagerly.

"You shall see me daily for the next ten days, dear Benny," she answered, affectionately.

From Park Lane Benjamin went to Cheviot House to bid good-by to Lord Wellrose. He sent up his card and was almost immediately shown to the private apartments of the earl, and announced as

"Ensign Douglas."

As he entered the room, his heart suddenly seemed to stand still in his bosom; his breath was suspended; for the Duchess of Cheviot, "the beautiful duchess," still beautiful with her family grown up around her—was passing out. She bowed slightly and smiled on her son's visitor, and so disappeared.

Benjamin caught his breath, and recovered himself as the young earl arose and came forward to greet him.

"You leave London to-morrow, Benjamin, I believe?" he inquired.

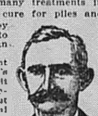
Cured Fifteen Years Ago of Piles and Eczema

By Using Dr. Chase's Ointment—Certifies That the Cure Was Permanent.

Some people have tried so many doctors and so many treatments in their search for cure for piles and eczema that they find it difficult to believe there is an actual cure.

The strong point about Dr. Chase's Ointment is that it not only brings relief promptly, but brings about actual and lasting cure.

In 1897 Mr. Ketcheson, 88 Douro street, Peterboro', Ont., wrote as follows:—"I was troubled for thirty years with itching piles and eczema. I could not sleep at night, and when I got warm the itching was terrible. Eczema covered my legs down to the knees, perfectly raw. I have tried every preparation I could hear of. Seeing Dr. Chase's Ointment advertised, I procured a box, and this Ointment effected a complete cure."



MR. KETCHESON

On Sept. 28, 1912, Mr. Ketcheson wrote as follows:—"I received a letter from you to-day, saying that you found on file a statement made by me 15 years ago. I have always given Dr. Chase's Ointment a good name since it cured me, and shall tell you how I came to use it.

"I had suffered for many years from eczema and piles, and had tried doctors and everything I could hear of in vain. Reading about Dr. Chase's Ointment, I purchased it at once, and was soon completely cured. That was fifteen years ago, so there can be no doubt of the cure being a permanent one. I have met a great many people who have been cured by Dr. Chase's Ointment."

A Quaint Old Clipping.

A young Fellow, of the City of Bristol, being in London lately, was, out of Curiosity, led to see the Lunatics at Bedlam. His first Approach was to the Cell of a poor Man, to whom he addressed himself thus—"So ho! what brings thee here?" The miserable Object remaining silent, he repeated his Question which was answered only by a Languishing Look, which so enraged the Visitant, that he immediately spit in the Man's Face through the Grate. This caused the Lunatic gently to wipe his Face with a wisp of Straw, and raising his drooping head, he made this calm, sage and sensible Reply—"I am here, sir, because God deprived me of that Blessing which you never enjoyed."

THE TURK IN EGYPT.

(Philadelphia Record)

The statement that "the Turkish forces are in practically undisturbed occupation of more than 30,000 square miles of Egypt," sounds rather ominous for the British until it is remembered that these 30,000 square miles are absolute desert, of practically no value to either invader or defender. So far as productivity is concerned, the peninsula of Sinai, the land thus occupied, is on a par with the Desert of Sahara. When Napoleon invaded Egypt he marched out of it in a direction just the reverse of that which the Turks are now taking. In view of recent Turkish performances in war there may well be doubts whether the Sultan's soldiers will be able to repeat the great spectacular success of the French conqueror.

WAR REPORTS.

(Detroit Free Press)

In considering reports given out in the European war, the newspaper reader is not called upon to decide which governments speak the truth as a matter of principle and as a settled policy. He has a larger task. He must take each individual item of news where there is conflict and decided which party is probably telling the greater falsehood, and after that how much legend there may be mixed with the account given by the lesser liar.

A GUARANTEED MEDICINE FOR LITTLE ONES

Baby's Own Tablets are a good medicine for little ones. They are guaranteed by a government analyst to be absolutely free from the opiates and narcotics found in so-called "soothing" mixtures. They cannot possibly do harm—they always do good. Once a mother has given them to her little ones she will use no other medicine. Concerning them Mrs. Jos. Desrosiers, St. Alphonse, Que., says: "Baby's Own Tablets saved my little one's life when he was suffering from worms, and I would not be without them." The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

A TIP FOR GERMANY.

(Pittsburg Gazette-Times)

The Germans are such clever aviators, why shouldn't they arrange a regular news service via aeroplane for the benefit of the British stay-at-homes who hear only of victories and hardly ever of defeats? There is no doubt that such bulletins would receive a wide circulation, while the scheme would provide a fresh outlet for German "kulture," this time of the literary variety.

WE'RE LEARNING.

(Woodstock Sentinel-Review)

We are all beginning to revise our opinions of Russian civilization. Before, we saw but one side of it, and that the least lovely; now we are getting some glimpse of the other and better. We are learning some other things, too, one of them being that the value of education depends on its quality. The Russian peasants are said to be steeped in ignorance; yet in their ignorance they show a higher quality of civilization than the shining products of the German universities, who are employing their learning for the justification of murder and the glorification of brute force. The Russian peasants are described as kindly, industrious and profoundly religious. Are they not better off in their ignorance than the Germans in their Kulture?

QUESTIONS A HERO'S COURSE.

(New York Sun)

One of the questions incidental to the European war to the serious discussion of which much time and thought will hereafter be devoted concerns the decision of King Albert of Belgium to oppose the passage of the German army across his territories, a decision which involved his country in the war, resulted in the devastation of its towns and fertile fields and reduced its people to ruin. To the inevitable consequences of this adventure every consideration of material well being was opposed; supporting it was the ardor of a brave people defending the integrity of their homes and the honor of their nation.

That the lives and property of his subjects were not lightly sacrificed by their gallant ruler is to be taken for granted. Yet there will unquestionably be men who, while stoutly maintaining that they are alive to the requirements of honor, will nevertheless criticise the adoption of the course which the Belgian Government followed. Against their contention a strong argument can undoubtedly be made; the two sides of the matter offer opportunity for endless disputation.

Years after the last shot is fired on the battlefields of to-day the debate will continue on the problem that may thus be stated: Resolved, That King Albert of Belgium was not justified in the decision he reached in 1914.

Her Dainty Speech.

There was one young woman in the box party at the theatre who took no part in the noisy clatter and giggle. With her gaze fixed upon the stage, she watched the progress of the play, indifferent to the gayety around her, except that her delicate, aristocratic, finely chiseled features bore a look of weariness and a scornful smile curved her lips. At last, however, she turned her head slowly and looked at the other members of the party. Then she spoke to the elderly matron sitting by her side. "That chicken in the blue kimono," she said, "thinks she is the whole custard!"—Argonaut.

THE "SCRAP OF PAPER."

(Philadelphia Record).

Undoubtedly England has interests of its own in defending Belgium and France. But that does not affect the validity of the "scrap of paper." Presumably the five nations that guaranteed Belgium neutrality have interests of their own in preserving it. In 1870 the neutrality of Belgium was more important to Prussia than to France, and Bismarck's publication of the Benedetti London Times was designed to arouse England to the possible use France would make of that country. The quotation from Gladstone's speech in 1870 used by the Imperial Chancellor has no reference to the validity of the neutrality treaty, but to the obligation upon England of defending it single-handed. Because of the suspected designs of France, exposed by Bismarck, England procured separate neutrality agreements with Prussia and France, which provided that on their expiration the status of Belgium should be controlled by the treaty of 1839, and Germany never abrogated the treaty. In the diplomatic correspondence and in the Imperial Chancellor's speech of August 4 no attempt was made to discredit Belgian neutrality, and military advantage, "the iron law of necessity," was alone offered as an explanation of the invasion. Finally, in the days prior to the war, England offered to keep out of the war if France and Belgium were left out.

CARLYLE ON WAR.

When Men Kill Men Between Whom There Was No Quarrel.

What, speaking in quite unofficial language, is the net purport and upshot of war? To my own knowledge, for example, there dwell and toil in the British village of Dumdredge usually some 500 souls. From these, by certain "natural enemies" of the French, there are successively selected during the French war, say thirty able-bodied men. Dumdredge, at her own expense, has suckled and nursed them. She has, not without difficulty and sorrow, fed them up to manhood and even trained them to crafts, so that one can weave, another build, another hammer, and the weakest can stand under thirty stone avoirdupois.

Nevertheless, amid much weeping and swearing, they are selected, all dressed in red and shipped away at the public charge some 2,000 miles, or, say, only to the south of Spain, and fed there till wanted. And now to that same spot in the south of Spain are thirty similar French artisans from a French Dumdredge, in like manner wending, till at length, after infinite effort, the two parties come into actual juxtaposition, and thirty stands fronting thirty, each with a gun in its hand.

Straightway the word "fire" is given, and they blow the souls out of one another, and in place of some sixty brisk, useful craftsmen the world has sixty dead carcases which it must bury and anew shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel? Busy as the devil is, not the smallest! They lived far enough apart, were the entirest strangers; nay, in so wide a universe there was even, unconsciously, by commerce, some mutual helpfulness between them. How then? Simpleton! Their governors had fallen out, and instead of shooting one another had the cunning to make these poor blockheads shoot. Alas, so it is in Deutschland, and hitherto in all other lands. Still, as of old, "what devilry so ever kings do the Greeks must pay the piper!"—Thomas Carlyle.

THE NAVY SPIRIT.

(London, Eng., Nation)

One realizes the wonderful spirit of the navy, not merely in the story of the loss of the "Formidable," but in accounts of the slighter accidents of the fleet. The other day, for example, the commander of a destroyer, rolling heavily in a gale, and with her engines disabled, tried to lessen the strain by ladling out oil. The seaman engaged in this work was washed overboard, and washed back again by a returning wave. He picked himself up, saluted his officer and said: "Very sorry, sir; lost the bucket."

PATROLING THE NORTH SEA.

(Pall Mall Gazette)

The raid of German cruisers on the Northeast coast of England should bring home to those who think of the North Sea as a rather big lake some idea of its real magnitude. It is not easy to define its northern limits, but the most moderate estimate of its area places it at [illegible] square miles, while a recent careful calculation by a German statistician gives it [illegible] square kilometres, which is equivalent to [illegible] square miles. But the ceaseless watch and ward of the British fleet now extends to Iceland, and altogether not less than [illegible] square miles of water has to be patrolled by the scouts of the grand fleet. Big as the fleet is, it is not big enough to prevent a surprise raid at some point of the [illegible] miles of coast on our eastern seaboard.

To insure every square mile of the North Sea itself, from the Shetlands to the mouth of the Channel, being kept under observation, at least [illegible] vessels would be needed, for under the most favorable atmospheric conditions barely 25 square miles can be swept from the crow's nest of a cruiser; and the German fleet can select its own time and place for its heroic bombardments of undefended towns. And in the Pacific and Indian Oceans, where for a brief period German cruisers were at large, the water area for their operations extended to [illegible] square miles.

A VERY SAFE OFFER.

(Woodstock Sentinel-Review)

It is safe enough to offer such a prize, for even if it did happen that a German soldier landed feet foremost in England there would be little chance of his ever going back to Germany to claim the reward.

Unsightly. Could Not Put Hand in Hot Water. Very Painful. Used Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. Completely Healed.

Imperial, Sask.—"My eczema appeared as a rash and itched and burned very badly. It was certainly unsightly and I could not put my hand in hot water or work at all when it was at the worst. Both my arms were covered with the eczema and it was very painful. I tried several things, but none did any good until one day the chemist advised me to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment, saying it was by far the best thing he knew of. I immediately used it, washing my arms and hands with the Cuticura Soap and then applying the Cuticura Ointment. A FALSE PROPHET.

(New York Sun)

Admiral Breusing, a retired officer, at a meeting of the Navy League at Wiesbaden before the war, talked with great confidence of the result of an encounter between the first line ships of the two nations. "The German fleet," said he, "will probably enter into this close action already possessing an advantage, due mainly to its excellent Krupp gun material, which England simply cannot equal."

A GERMAN LIE NAILED.

(Niagara Falls, N. Y., Gazette)

The Cologne Gazette has learned that Lord Kitchener threatened to bombard the French coast if France made a separate treaty with Germany in September. By Sept. 6, Von Kluck was checked in his rush on Paris and by Sept. 10 his "strategic retirement" was well defined. Why were the French in such a hurry to make peace just then? And why, if they were in a hurry, did they give up so meekly? Meekness has not been their distinguishing mark in this unpleasantness.

EDITORIAL

THURSDAY, FEB. 11, 1915.

SIR WILLIAM OSLER.

Sir William Osler has volunteered for the front in connection with the McGill University base hospital, where no doubt his great skill will be of inestimable value to the wounded. The February number of the Popular Science Monthly contains a portrait of the doctor, copy of a chalk drawing by Sargent. The original was presented to Johns Hopkins Hospital, with which Dr. Osler was long connected. The portrait was presented to the hospital on the celebration of its 25th anniversary. Prof. William S. Thayer made the presentation, when he paid the following tribute to Sir William:

The precious gift it is my privilege now to offer to the hospital is but another reminder of him who, though absent in person, has been with us and in us and around us in spirit from the beginning of this gathering. What have been his contributions to medical science, what his inspiration and efforts and example have been to this institution are so familiar to us all that it would be impudent to mention them. Would that we could put into words the influence that the man has had upon our lives! How much of that which is best in us is due to him and to his example! In all the fifteen years of my close and constant association with him I never knew him to do a hasty or an inconsiderate act, and I never heard him speak an unkind word of any man. Of how many can one say this? He is like Maeterlinck's true sage, in whose presence discord and strife and misunderstanding are impossible. In losing him we felt that we had lost our best friend and adviser, but he left us a legacy of tolerance and forbearance and charity that is among the richest of our possessions. This whole institution is replete with memories of the man; and no statue, no tablet, no portrait can bring him more vividly to our minds. But there will be others who follow after to whom our poor words will convey but a faint picture of that which is a part of us. And so his old disciples welcome with heartfelt gratitude every new image which may help better to fix for posterity the presence of our dear chief. The value of this new possession is greatly enhanced in that it comes to us through the thoughtful generosity of her who shares with him our lasting love and affection. Lady Osler, of her own initiative, has induced Mr. Sargent to make this replica of the portrait drawn by him for the College of Physicians in Philadelphia, and has sent it to us to-day. And so after all he is with us! We shall gain new inspiration from his counterfeit presence. Let us wait patiently in the hope that, four years hence, when the heavy clouds of the hour shall have rolled away, we may give him that welcome which our hearts hold for him to-day.

THE SUPPRESSED PASTORAL.

The attempted suppression of the pastoral letter of Cardinal Mercier, of Belgium, to his people has resulted in giving it wider publicity. It has been published in the Tablet and sent broadcast all over the world. A perusal of the document shows why the Germans wanted to suppress it, and why they interned the Bishop in his residence when he refused to retract. Here follows a few quotations from the letter:

For in truth our soldiers are our saviours.

A first time, at Liege, they saved France; a second time, in Flanders, they arrested the advance of the enemy upon Calais. France and England know it; and Belgium stands before them both, and before the entire world, as a nation of heroes.

x x x

Pray daily, my brethren, for these two hundred and fifty thousand, and for their leaders to victory; pray for the fallen; pray for those who are still engaged; pray for the recruits who are making ready for the fight to come.

x x x

Thousands of Belgian citizens have in like manner been deported to the prisons of Germany, to Munsterlagen, to Celle, to Madgeburg. At Munsterlagen alone three thousand one hundred civil prisoners were numbered. History will tell of the physical and moral torments of their long martyrdom. Hundreds of innocent men were shot. I possess no complete necrology; but I know that there were ninety-one shot at Aerschot, that there, under pain of death, their fellow citizens were compelled to dig their graves. In the Louvain group of communes 16 persons, men and women, old men and sucklings, rich and poor, in health and sickness, were shot or burnt.

In my diocese alone I know that 13 priests or religious were put to death (9.) One of these, the parish priest of Gelrode, suffered, I believe, a veritable martyrdom.

We can neither count our dead nor compute the measure of our ruins. And what would it be if we turned our sad steps towards Liege, Namur, Andenne, Dinant, Tamines, Charleroi, and elsewhere?

x x x

Belgium was thus bound in honor to defend her own independence. She kept her word. The other powers were bound to respect and to protect her neutrality. Germany violated her oath; England kept hers.

These are the facts.

x x x

Well, I affirm upon my honor, and I am prepared to assert upon faith of my oath, that until now I have not met a single ecclesiastic, secular or regular, who had once incited civilians to bear arms against the enemy. All have loyally followed the instructions of their Bishops, given in the early days of August, to the effect that they were to use their moral influence over the civil population, so that order might be preserved and military regulations observed.

Statements such as these would not be palatable to the Kaiser, who brags about his reliance upon divine Providence.

British Columbia has solved the unemployed problem by mobilizing its whole militia force at the expense of the Dominion and keeping its members on the pay roll of the country. Pretty foxy.

The way the law hangs on to Thaw is a lesson for Canada. We have an idea that if he had lived in Canada he would have been a free man by this time. Some member of the House would have saved his neck.

◆

Speaking at Montreal the other day Clifford Sifton declared that nothing but the British navy stood between Canada and the fate of Belgium. He laughed at the Monroe Doctrine, saying that should such a force of Germans land in the States as invested Antwerp every place worth taking would be seized in two weeks without a battle, since any force the Americans could gather would suffice merely for a butchery, not a battle. Wake up, Canada!

◆

Sir Edward Grey punctures the story told by Bethmann-Hollweg that Belgium had violated her own neutrality and that Britain had censured with her to do so. What Britain did was to discuss with Belgium how best to defend her territory should it be assailed by Germany. Britain did this because Germany had a network of strategic railways right on the Belgian border. The suspicion that Germany would try to hack its way through Belgium soon became a reality.

Mrs. Minden Cole spoke in Montreal the other day on "The Consumers' view of Made-in-Canada." She declared that restricted trading was unpatriotic, and that the made-in-Canada cry was made in Germany. Mrs. Cole said that one way of making wars in the future impossible is to oppose any petty doctrine of buying things only made in our own country. We do not know who Mrs. Cole is. But if she means that we cannot live without buying as well as selling she is not far wrong.

There are said to be 250,000 unemployed people in Canada at the present time. The prospects are that many of these will be unemployed for a long time. They should be given employment. That can best be done by putting those fitted on the land so that they could make a living for themselves and their families. We believe that the Government should withdraw all its immigration agents from Britain and the continent, and give them the job of placing our own idle people on farms. The money that would otherwise be spent on immigration could be spent in assisting these people to make a beginning in carving out for themselves homes in the Northwest or New Ontario. Money thus spent would be well spent.

Was All Run Down
WITH HEART TROUBLE AND NERVOUSNESS.

When the heart does not do its work properly and the nerves become unstrung the whole system becomes weak and run down, and needs building up before you can feel fit again.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills will do this for you.

Mrs. Hugh Mosher, Chester Basin, N.S., writes: "Just a few lines to let you know what Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills have done for me. I have suffered greatly with heart trouble and nervousness, and was all run down. I used lots of medicine, but received no benefit until I was advised to try your pills, and did so, and before I had finished the first box I felt so much better I got 5 boxes, and am now well and strong. I can truly say they are the best medicine I have ever used. I cannot praise them too highly. I recommend them to anyone suffering from heart trouble."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

A Public Idol

"Paul has just come in, with victory written on his brow. The English consul was of no use; but, as he was strolling home, he went into St. Mark's, and there, of course, found them! In the church were apparently all the English people who have as yet ventured to Venice; and these, or most of them, seemed to be following in the wake of a little party of four persons—two ladies, a gentleman and a lame girl walking with a crutch. An excited English tourist condescended to inform Paul that it was 'the great English actress, Miss Bretherton,' who was creating all the commotion. Then, of course, he went up to her—he was provoked that he could hardly see her in the dim light of St. Mark's—introduced himself, and described our perplexities. Of course, she had written. I expected as much. Jacques must certainly be pensioned off! Paul thought the other three very inferior to her, though the uncle was civil, and talked condescendingly of Venice as though it were even good enough to be admired by a Worrall. It is arranged that the beauty is to come to see me to-morrow if, after Caterina has operated upon us during two meals, we are still alive. Good-night, and good-bye."

"Venice, Aug. 7.

"Well, I have seen her! It has been a blazing day. I was sitting in the little garden which separates one-half of our rooms from the other, while Caterina was arranging the dejeuner under the little acacia arbor in the centre of it. Suddenly Felicie came out from the house, and behind her a tall figure in a large hat and a white dress. The figure held out both hands to me in a cordial, un-English way, and said a number of pleasant things, rapidly, in a delicious voice; while I, with the dazzle of the sun in my eyes so that I could hardly make out the features, stood feeling a little thrilled by the advent of so famous a person. In a few minutes, however, as it seemed to me, we were sitting under the acacias, she was helping me to cut up the melon and arrange the figs, as if we had known one another for months, and I was experiencing one of those sudden rushes of liking which, as you know, are a weakness of mine. She stayed and took her meal with us. Paul, of course, was fascinated, and for once has not set her down as a reputation surfaite.

"Her beauty has a curious air of the place; and now I remember that her mother was Italian—Venetian, actually, was it not? That accounts for it; she is the Venetian type spiritualized. At the foundation of her face, as it were, lies the face of the Burano lacemaker; only the original type has been so refined, so chiseled and smoothed away, that to speak fancifully, only a beautiful ghost of it remains. That large stateliness of her movement, too, is Italian. You may see it in any Venetian street, and Veronese has fixed it in art.

"While we were sitting in the garden who should be announced but Edward Wallace? I knew, of course, from you that he might be here about this time, but in the hurry of our setting in I had quite forgotten his existence, so that the sight of his trim person bearing down upon us was a surprise. He and the Bretherton party, however, had been going about together for several days, so that he and she had plenty of gossip in common. Miss Bretherton's enthusiasm about Venice is of a very naive, hot, outspoken kind. It seems to me that she is a very susceptible creature. She lives her life fast, and crowds into it a greater number of sensations than most people. All this zest and pleasure must consume a vast amount of nervous force, but it makes her very refreshing to people as blasés as Paul and I are. My first feeling about her is very much what yours was. Personally, there seems to be all the stuff in her of which an actress is made; will she some day stumble upon the discovery of how to bring her own individual flame and force to bear upon her art? I should think it not unlikely, and, altogether, I feel as though I should take a more hopeful view of her intellectually than you do. You see, my dear Eustace, you men never realize how clever we women are, how fast we learn, and how quickly we catch up hints from all quarters under heaven and improve upon them. An actress so young and so sympathetic as Isabel Bretherton must still be very much of an unknown quantity dramatically. I know you think that the want of training is fatal, and that popularity will stereotype her faults. It may be so; but I am inclined to think, from my first sight of her, that she is a nature that will gather from life rather what stimulates it than what dulls and vulgarizes it. Altogether, when I compare my first impressions of her with the image of her left by your letters, I feel that I have been pleasantly surprised. Only in the matter of intelligence. Otherwise it has, of course, been your descriptions of her that have planted and nurtured in me that strong sense of attraction which blossomed into liking at the moment of personal contact."

"August 10.

"This afternoon we have been out in the gondola belonging to this modest establishment, with our magnificent gondolier, Piero, and his boy, to convey us to the Lido. I got Miss Bretherton to talk to me about her Jamaica career. She made us all laugh with her accounts of the blood-and-thunder pieces in which the audiences at the Kingston theatre reveled. She seems generally to have played the 'Bandit's Daughter, the 'Smuggler's Wife,' or 'The European Damsel Carried off by Indians,' or some other thrilling elemental personage of that kind. 'The White Lady' was, apparently, her first introduction to a more complicated order of play. It is extraordinary, when one comes to think of it, how little positive dramatic knowledge she must have! She knows some Shakespeare, I think—at least, she mentions two or three plays—and I gather from something she said that she is now making the inevitable study of Juliet that every actress makes sooner or later; but Sheridan, Goldsmith, and, of course, all the French people, are mere names to her. When I think of the minute exhaustive training our Paris actors go through, and compare it with such a state of nature as hers, I am amazed at what she has done! For, after all, you know, she must be able to act to some extent; she must know a great deal more of her business than you and I suspect, or she could not get on at all."

"August 16.

"It is about a week, I see, since I write to you last. During that time we have seen a great deal more of Miss Bretherton, sometimes in company with her belongings, sometimes without them, and my impressions of her have ripened very fast. Oh, my dear Eustace, you have been hasty—all the world has been hasty. Isabel Bretherton's real self is now only coming to the front, and it is a self which, as I say to myself with astonishment, not even your keen eyes have ever seen—hardly suspected even. Should I myself a woman, have been as blind to a woman's capabilities, I wonder? Very likely! These sudden rich developments of youth are often beyond all calculation.

"Mr. Wallace's attitude makes me realize more than I otherwise could the past and present condition of things. He comes and talks to me with amazement of the changes in her tone and outlook, of the girl's sharpening intellect and growing sensitiveness, and as he recalls incidents and traits of the London season—confessions or judgments or blunders of hers, and puts them beside the impression which he sees her to be making on Paul and myself—I begin to understand from his talk and his bewilderment something of the great nature of the case. Intellectually, it has been the ugly duckling over again. Under all the crude, unfledged imperfection of her young performance, you people who have watched her with your trained critical eye seem to me never to have suspected the coming wings, the strange nascent power, which is only now asserting itself in the light of day.

"'What has Eustace been about?' said Paul to me last night, after we had all returned from rambling round and round the moonlit Piazza and he had been describing to me his talk with her. 'He ought to have seen farther ahead. That creature is only just beginning to live—and it will be a life worth having!' He has kindled it, too, as much as anybody. Of course, we have not seen her act yet, and ignorant—yes, she is certainly ignorant—though not so much as I imagine. But as for natural power and delicacy of mind, there can be no question at all about them!"

"'I don't know that Eustace did question them,' I said; 'he thought simply that she had no conception of what her art really required of her, and never would have because of her popularity.'

"To which Paul replied that, as far as he could make out, nobody thought more meanly of her popularity than she did, and he has been talking a great deal to her about her season.

"'I never saw a woman at a more critical or interesting point of development,' he exclaimed at last, striding up and down, and so absorbed in the subject that I could have almost laughed at his eagerness. 'Something or other, luckily for her, set her on the right track three months ago, and it is apparently a nature on which nothing is lost. One can see it in the way in which she takes Venice; there isn't a scrap of her little as she knows about it—that isn't keen and interested and wide awake!'

"'Well, after all,' I reminded him as he was settling down to his books, 'we know nothing about her as an actress.'

"'We shall see,' he said; 'I will find out something about that too before long.'"

"And so he has!

"August 17th.

"Paul has been devoting himself more and more to the beauty, Mr. Wallace and I looking on with considerable amusement and interest; and this afternoon, finding it intolerable that Miss Bretherton has not even a bowing acquaintance with any of his favorite plays, Augier, Dumas, Victor Hugo, or anything else, he has been reading plays to us in the garden, running on from scene to scene and speech to speech, translating as he went. She in rapt attention, and he gesticulating and shouting, and, except for an occasional queer rendering that made us laugh, getting on capitally with his English. She was enchanted; the novelty and the excitement of it absorbed her; and every now and then she would stop Paul with a little imperious wave of her hand, and repeat the substance of a speech after him with an impetuous élan, an energy of comprehension, which drew little nods of satisfaction out of him, and sometimes produced a strong and startling effect upon myself and Mr. Wallace. However, Mr. Wallace might stare as he liked, the two people concerned were totally unconscious of the rest of us until at last, after the great death scene in the Nuit Blanche, Paul threw down the book almost with a sob, and she, rising in a burst of feeling, held out her white arms toward an imaginary lover, and with extraordinary skill and memory repeated the substance of the heroine's last speech:

"'Achille, beloved! my eyes are dim—the mists of death are gathering. O Achille! the white cottage by the river—the nest in the reeds—your face and mine in the water—the blue heaven below us in the stream—O lovely! those hands, those lips! But, Achille, listen! It is the cruel wind rising, rising; it chills me to the bone, it chokes, it stifles me! I can not see the river, and the cottage is gone and the sun. O Achille, it is dark, so dark! Gather me close, beloved!—closer, closer. O death is kind!—tender, like your touch! I have no fears—none!'

"She sank back into her chair. Anything more pathetic, more noble than her intonation of those words could not have been imagined. Desclée herself could not have spoken them with a more [illegible], a more piercing tenderness. I was so confused by a multitude of conflicting feelings—my own impressions and yours, the realities of the present position and the possibilities of the future—that I forgot to applaud her. It was the first time I had had any glimpse at all of her dramatic power, and, rough and imperfect as the test was, it seemed to me enough. I have not been so devoted to the Français and to some of the people connected with it for ten years for nothing! One gets a kind of insight from long habit which, I think, one may trust. So, you blind Eustace, how could you forget that for a creature so full of primitive energy, so rich in the stuff of life, nothing is irreparable? Education has passed her by. Well, she will go to find her education. She will make a teacher out of every friend, out of every sensation. Incident and feeling, praise and dispraise, will all alike lend to mould the sensitive plastic material into shape. So far she may have remained outside her art, the art, no doubt, has been a conventional appendage and little more. Training would have given her good conventions, whereas she has only picked up bad and imperfect ones. But no training could have given her what she will evidently soon develop for herself, that force and flame of imagination which fuses together instrument and idea in one great artistic whole. She has that imagination. You can see it in her responsive ways, her quick sensitive emotion. Only let it be roused and guided to a certain height, and it will overleap the barriers which have hemmed it in, and pour itself into the channels made ready for it by her art.

"There, at least, you have my strong impression. It is, in many ways, at variance with some of my most cherished principles, for both you and I are perhaps inclined to overrate the value of education, whether technical or general, in its effect on the individuality. And, of course, a better technical preparation would have saved Isabel Bretherton an immense amount of time; would have prevented her from contracting a host of bad habits—all of which she will have to unlearn. But the root of the matter is in her; of that I am sure; and whatever weight of hostile circumstance may be against her, she will, if she keeps her health—as to which I am sometimes, like you, a little anxious—break through it all and triumph.

"But if you do not understand her quite, you have enormously helped her; so much I will tell you for your comfort. She said to me yesterday abruptly—we were alone in our gondola, far out on the lagoon—'Did your brother ever tell you of a conversation he and I had in the woods at Nuneham about Mr. Wallace's play?'

"'Yes,' I answered, with outward coldness, but a little inward trepidation; 'I have not known anything distress him so much for a long time. He thought you had misunderstood him.'

"'No,' she said, quietly, but as it seemed to me with an undercurrent of emotion in her voice, 'I did not misunderstand him. He meant what he said, and I would have forced the truth from him, whatever happened. I was determined to make him show me what he felt. That London season was sometimes terrible to me. I seemed to myself to be living in two worlds—one a world in which there was always a sea of faces which was enough to turn anybody's head, but which after a while repelled me as if there was something humiliating in it; and then, on the other side, a little inner world of people I cared for and respected, who looked at me kindly, and thought for me, but to whom as an actress I was just of no account, at all! It was your brother who first roused that sense in me; it was so strange and painful, for how could I help at first believing in all the hubbub and applause?'

"'Poor child,' I said, reaching out my hand for one of hers. 'Did Eustace make himself disagreeable to you?'

"'It was more, I think,' she answered, as if reflecting, 'the standard he always seemed to carry about with him than anything connected with my own work. At least, of course, I mean before that Nuneham day. Ah, that Nuneham day! It cut deep.'

"She turned away from me, and leaned over the side of the boat, so that I could not see her face.

"'You forced it out of Eustace, you know,' I said, trying to laugh at her, 'you uncompromising young person! Of course, he flattered himself that you forgot all about his preaching the moment you got home. Men always make themselves believe what they want to believe.'

"'Why should he want to believe so?' she replied quickly. 'I had half foreseen it, I had forced it from him, and yet I felt it like a blow! It cost me a sleepless night, and some—well, some very bitter tears. Not that the tears were a new experience. How often, after all that noise at the theatre, have I gone home and cried myself to sleep over the impossibility of doing what I wanted to do, of moving those hundreds of people, of making them feel, and of putting my own feeling into shape! But that night, and with my sense of illness just then, I saw myself—it seemed to me quite in the near future—grown old and ugly, a forgotten failure, without any of those memories which console people who have been great when they must give up. I felt myself struggling against such a weight of ignorance, of bad habits, of unfavorable surroundings. How was I ever to get free and to reverse that judgment of Mr. Kendal's? My very success stood in my way. How was "Miss Bretherton" to put herself to school?'

"'But now,' I said to her warmly, 'you have got free; or, rather, you are on the way to freedom.'

"She thought a little without speaking, her chin resting on her hand, her elbow on her knee. We were passing the great red-brown mass of the Armenian convent. She seemed to be drinking in the dazzling harmonies of blue and warm brown and pearly light. When she did speak again it was very slowly, as though she were trying to give words to a number of complex impressions.

"'Yes,' she said; 'it seems to me that I am different, but I can't tell exactly how or why. I see all sorts of new possibilities, new meanings everywhere; that is one-half of it! But the other, and the greater, half is—how to make all these new feelings and any new knowledge which may come to me tell on my art.' And then she changed altogether with one of those delightful swift transformations of hers, and her face rippled with laughter. 'At present the chief result of the difference, whatever it may be, seems to be to make me most unmanageable at home. I am forever disagreeing with my people, saying I can't do this and I won't do that. I am getting to enjoy having my own way in the most abominable manner.' And then she caught my hand, that was holding hers, between both her own, and said half laughing and half in earnest:

"'Did you ever realize that I don't know any single language besides my own—not even French? That I can't read any French book or any French play?'

"'Well,' I said, half laughing too, 'it is very astonishing. And you know it can't go on if you are to do what I think you will do. French you positively must learn, and learn quickly. I don't mean to say that we haven't good plays and a tradition of our own; but for the moment France is the very centre of your art, and you cannot remain at a distance from it.' The French have organized their knowledge; it is available for all who come. Ours is still floating and amateurish."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson vii.—February 14, 1915.

Samuel Called to Be a Prophet.—1 Sam. 1:24-28; 3: 1-21.

Commentary.—I. Samuel presented to the Lord (1: 21-28.) According to the pledge which Hannah made to the Lord, if he would give her a son, she took him to the house of the Lord at Shiloh, and there gave him over into the hands of Eli, the priest. Samuel was just weaned and could not have been more than two or three years old, even taking into consideration Oriental customs. "The objection has been made that so young a child would have been troublesome to Eli, but there were women engaged in the tabernacle service, to whose care he might have been committed. It was important that he should be dedicated as soon as possible. The house of God was to be the only home he knew, the earliest impressions of his boyhood were to be those of the sanctuary."—Kirkpatrick. Hannah took as an offering to the Lord three bullocks, a half bushel or more of flour and a skin-bottle of wine. It has been suggested that one bullock was for a burnt-offering, one for the "sacrifice in performing a vow," and one for a peace offering (Num. 15: 8).

II. The Lord calling Samuel (vs. 1-10). 1. Samuel—The name means, "Asked of God." Ministered unto the Lord before Eli—A minister is a servant. Samuel was, according to the opinion of Josephus, twelve years old at this time. He had duties to perform about the tabernacle, pertaining to the light (v. 3) and the doors (v. 15). He was also the personal attendant of Eli, who was aged and partially blind. Word of the Lord was precious—The word was rare, as the moral and spiritual condition of Israel was not favorable to frequent messages from God to the people. Priests and people had departed from the Lord. No open vision—"No frequent vision." 2. At that time—It was during the period of the scarcity of revelation. It was a memorable time in the lives of Eli and Samuel. Eli was laid down in his place—He probably slept in one of the buildings surrounding the tabernacle erected for the accommodation of the priests and other attendants. Samuel slept near by. 3. Ere the lamp of God went out—This was the most holy place. The ark was the symbol of God's presence. It was a chest that had been made according to directions given to Moses by the Lord, in Mount Sinai.

4. the Lord called Samuel—The boy was awakened by the call, "and he answered, Here am I." Samuel was attentive to his duties. The voice must have sounded to him like that of Eli, but being awakened from sleep by the call, he would not be likely to judge clearly whence it came. 5. he ran unto Eli—Inasmuch as he was accustomed to wait upon Eli, it was entirely natural that he should suppose that Eli had called him, thinking he needed some attention. I called not—Samuel must have been surprised at Eli's answer, but he took it that he himself might have been mistaken. At Eli's direction he obediently lay down again. 6. thou didst call me—Samuel's readiness and attention afford an excellent example of the virtue of obedience. 7. Samuel did not yet know the Lord—Samuel knew not the Lord in the way of receiving divine communications from him, for, as already stated, such communications were at that time rare.—Whedon. The second part of the verse explains the first.

8. Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child—If Samuel had come to him but once or even twice, thinking that he had called him, he would probably have thought the boy was dreaming; but when he came the third time, positive that Eli had called him, the priest was convinced that the Lord was speaking to him. 9. speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth—No wiser advice could have been given than this. When God calls, and he calls all, this is a most fitting response to make. 10. the Lord came, and stood, and called—God not only spoke to Samuel, but he also appeared to him in some visible form. He calls all children by his Spirit. He speaks to them while their hearts are tender.

III. The message to Eli (vs. 11-18). 11. the Lord said to Samuel—God did not at this time speak directly to Eli. He had previously sent a prophet to him, as recorded in the preceding chapter. He speaks to Samuel now, in calling him to the prophetic office, and for the purpose of preparing him for receiving and delivering other messages from himself. ears . . . shall tingle—As a loud, sharp, discordant note thrills one's ears with pain, so the bitter tidings of Israel's woe in the judgment about to fall on Eli's house would shock all Israel.—Terry. Reference is made to the coming defeat of Israel by the Philistines, in which the ark of the covenant would be captured, Eli's sons would lose their lives, and Eli himself would die as a consequence of the defeat. 12. which I have spoken—By the prophet, as recorded in 1 Sam., 2:27-36. make an end—The Lord would complete the word which he had threatened by his prophet. 13. his sons made themselves vile—They were greedy and licentious. restrained them not—Eli "contented himself with gentle expostulation (1 Samuel 2:23), instead of thrusting them out of the sacred office they had so grossly abused. By this weak indulgence he became partaker of their sins." 14-18. Samuel lay until morning, then opened the doors of the house of the Lord as usual. Eli had to press the boy strongly for a report of what God had said to him. When he heard the message, he quietly acknowledged the justice of it all.

IV. Samuel a prophet (vs. 19-21). 19. The Lord was with him—God's presence affords comfort, strength and guidance. God was with Abraham (Gen. 21: 22), Jacob (Gen. 28: 15), Joseph (Gen. 39: 2), Moses (Exod. 3: 12), Joshua (Josh. 1: 5), Gideon (Judges 6: 16), David (1 Sam. 16: 18), and others. Let none of his words fall to the ground—What Samuel said under divine inspiration came to pass. He was a true prophet. 20. From Dan even to Beer-sheba—This phrase denotes the total extent of Israel. Dan was at the extreme north and Beer-sheba at the extreme south. Was established to be a prophet of the Lord—All the people of Israel were convinced that Samuel was a prophet from the fact that all his prophetic utterances proved true. 21. The visible abode of Jehovah was in Shiloh and there he revealed himself to his prophet.

SUFFERED WITH LAME BACK.

Could Hardly Straighten Up For Pain.

When the back becomes lame and starts to ache it is the sure sign of kidney trouble.

Mr. J. W. Aylett, South Oshawa, Ont., writes: "I have much pleasure in recommending Doan's Kidney Pills. Last summer I suffered with a lame back. Sometimes I could hardly straighten up for the pain. I read about Doan's Kidney Pills and decided to give them a trial. I can truthfully say that the second box cured me. I can recommend them to all as a speedy cure to all suffering with backache."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

Questions.—Who were Elkanah and Hannah? What was the burden of Hannah's prayer at the house of the Lord? To whom did Hannah "lend" Samuel and for how long? Where did Samuel live? What were some of the boy Samuel's duties? What did he hear one night? How many times was he called? What message did the Lord give Samuel for Eli? How did Eli receive the message? Tell how Samuel became established as a prophet in Israel.

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Preparation for Service.

I. Parental consecration.

II. Individual consecration.

I. Parental consecration. Much of scripture biography begins with a statement regarding the parentage of the subject. We learn of Samuel by first learning of his mother. She had asked God for a son. She had emptied her heart of its sorrow and had it filled with joy. As she came to Shiloh her soul was deeply moved upon the recollection of the time when she had prayed in that place for a child, and further in contemplation of the precious gift received, and even more by her present purpose to consecrate him to the service of the Lord for life. Hannah did not know what honor God would put upon her sacrifice nor what honor would come to her through her son. The coming of Samuel was the beginning of a new era, the time of a great crisis in Jewish history. His life began in a dark and stormy period amid a demoralized priesthood, among a people alienated from God, in a time of great moral and spiritual darkness. Among the heroes of God's kingdom who have been brought to the Lord by the prayers of their mothers and consecrated as his instruments for service, Samuel is a shining example. This child, devoutly consecrated by his mother, became great as a prophet, the one chosen of God to close the order of judges and to inaugurate the government of kings. By a striking concurrence we have two domestic histories unfolded side by side, the wise parental training of Elkanah and Hannah and the tragic story of Eli and his sons. Hannah stands as a model for mothers; Eli stands a warning to fathers. The lesson is plain that a parent is a ruler by appointment of God, held at God's bar accountable for the office and work as a ruler. Child life is of untold value in the sight of God.

II. Individual consecration. Out of Hannah's sorrow and her concentrated continued, importunate prayer came a nation's reformation and salvation. The early occupation of Samuel, in the temple, was the initiatory stage of his life-work. He was destined to maintain the law and authority of God, to rebuke iniquity, to check degeneracy and to insist upon the separation of Israel from heathen nations and their customs. He was to retrieve losses, assuage excitements, reestablish justice, reprove, rebuke and exhort the people. His business was to keep all Israel true to the divine purpose for which they had been made a nation. In the morning of the day and in the morning of his life the Lord called Samuel and gave him great spiritual light. His call was the first step toward superseding Eli. It was necessary that Eli should be assured that Samuel's call was from the Lord, and that it was the beginning of the fulfilment of God's threatenings against himself, and that the religious supremacy of the priest was to be superseded by that of the prophet. Samuel was thus a witness to God's demand for a spiritual religion in contrast to mere form. The three calls convinced Eli and prepared Samuel. There is something very prophetic and beautiful in Eli's promise, and ungrudging recognition of God's call to His young attendant. He exhibited no personal or official jealousy, but kindly directed Samuel how to receive God's message. He was unswervingly just. He must have foreboded some message of reproof and judgment when the call came not to himself. Simplicity, uprightness and obedience were expressed in Samuel's repeated appearance before Eli. The young child offered himself most unconsciously to a duty, immediate and pressing, which put his character to a test by leaving to his judgment the use which he should make of so terrible a communication. Samuel exhibited great self-control, discretion and considerate reserve. While he was faithful to God he was respectful to Eli. The verdict against Eli was that he did nothing effectual in the way of preventing his sons in their iniquities, which his duty as a high priest should have led him to do. He who had judged Israel for nearly forty years was now condemned at the bar of his own conscience. In sharp contrast to the exaltation of Samuel to his prophetic life is the picture of Eli's house. IMPOSSIBLE ARMIES.

(Toronto Star)

No country of Germany's population could begin to put in the field such armies of men as are estimated. To say that she will put in the field 7,000,000 men is absurd. That would mean that of her total population, men, women and children, one person in every six would go to war. To begin with there are between two and three million more females than males in Germany. Of the males millions are too old to serve as soldiers, and further millions are too young. Other millions, while of requisite age, are owing to physical disabilities of no use as soldiers. It will probably tax Germany to the utmost to put in the field forces numbering much over half of the estimates [illegible] been given out.

The formal opening of the Ontario Legislature is scheduled for Feb. 16th, and on Feb. 17th the House will adjourn out of respect to the memory of the late Prime Minister, Sir James Whitney. On this occasion fitting tributes to his memory will be paid by the leaders of the Government and of the Opposition and by other members of the Legislature.

◆

There is not much use in making partizan taunts at a time like this, but many Conservative papers are taunting the Liberals because there was a New Zealand ship in the North Sea battle, but none from Canada. There is an Austrian fleet also taking part in this war, and it is financed and manned by Australians, but the Canadian fleet that was projected at the same time as it, was destroyed by the Conservatives in 1911 to win the support of the Nationalists of Quebec. There is plenty of room for taunts on both sides if newspapers have nothing better to do than resort to the use of them.

WAR AND FACTORIES

The immense orders for war materials placed in Canada during the past six months have largely contributed to the maintenance of industrial conditions at something like a normal level. As an English military officer has said, the British War Office is endeavoring by every means to make people of the Dominion "some slight return for the magnificent sacrifices" they are making in men and money in the Empire's day of trial. According to the same source of information Canadian mills and factories show their appreciation of the war orders by producing such goods as are worthy of the country and as will merit repeat orders. At least there have been no complaints from the British War Office as there have been about some of the boots furnished to the Canadian contingent. Nor have there been any expressions of dissatisfaction concerning war contracts undertaken by Canadian mills and factories for the French and Russian Governments.

Since coming to Canada, last October, Mr. F. W. Stobart, purchasing commissioner for the British War Office, has placed 255 contracts with an aggregate value of $8,000,000. Of this sum only $765,000 went to the United States for goods which could not be got here, more than nine-tenths of the expenditures thus being made within the Dominion and going to keep Canadian workmen and Canadian capital employed.

POTASH IN AGRICULTURE

For many years the Stassfurt mines in Germany have been practically the sole source of the potash compounds used for fertilizing purposes on this continent. Among the evil effects resulting from the present war, therefore, may be counted the cutting off from the markets of the world the supply of this material. Dr. Shutt, Dominion Chemist, regards this circumstance as not so serious as some may consider. In order to place his views before the farmers of Canada, Dr. Shutt has issued circular No. 7 of the Experimental Farms, "Potash in Agriculture". It takes up the subject under several heads and reaches the following conclusions:—

"It is only our light, sandy and gravelly soils that are markedly deficient in potash and this element is only specially called for by clover, potatoes, roots and leafy crops generally. There is yet some potash in the market though it will probably have to be purchased in the form of a complete fertilizer. We have several Canadian sources of potash available to the farmer—notably liquid manure, wood ashes and sea weed—materials rich in this useful constituent and which are more or less readily obtainable in many parts of the Dominion. And lastly there are the indirect potassic fertilizers, which though not adding to the sum total of the soils potash yet may serve a useful purpose by liberating it in available forms and thus in times such as the present may help to tide us over until potash compounds are once more upon the market."

This circular is available free at the Publications Branch of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa.

A NERVY YOUTH.

DRUG STORE FIRE.

Fire broke out in Mr. S. B. Clarke's Drug Store on Wednesday night of last week which did about $1000 damage. The fire was discovered about 10 o'clock. Mr. Clarke was in the store until after 9 o'clock and when he left everything seemed to be all right. The fire likely started in the prescription desk, and its origin is not known for certain, though it may have been caused by a customer leaving his cigarette on the desk. The fire brigade turned out promptly and the Hanover Boy Scouts also were on deck to lend a hand, but the hose was not used, the fire being extinguished with a few buckets of water. Had the fire occurred a couple of hours later a section of the business blocks on Main Street might have been wiped out, as Mr. Clarke's Store is in the heart of main street. Mr. Clarke's loss was partly covered by insurance.—Hanover Post.

EIGHTY DEATHS.

The Germans are taking their almost daily toll in death from the Princess Patricias, the only Canadian regiment thus far in the firing line. Nine of this crack regiment have to date been killed or died of wounds; another has been reported dead, cause not given, and an eleventh has died in an hospital at Boulogne from spinal meningitis. The Germans are apparently sniping for officers, for of the nine killed in action seven have either been commissioned or non-commissioned officers. The total list of deaths among Canadian troops in England and at the front is now 80, including Lieut. William Sharpe of Ottawa, who met death yesterday while flying in Shoreham. It is reported by the militia authorities that the outbreak of spinal meningitis is now checked, and it is understood here that every precaution is being taken to prevent a recurrence of the epidemic.

NOT SUCH A NUISANCE.

The Ontario Sheep Breeders's Association discussed the dog nuisance at great length on Thursday last and finally came to the conclusion that too much emphasis was being placed on this aspect of sheep raising. One member doubted if there was a single farmer who could show much damage to flocks from dogs over a five-years period. The Act was well enforced, and the suggestion was made that some central association should be given the control of dog tax monies and of paying full value for sheep killed by marauding dogs. Hon. James Duff thought the farmer should get the commercial value for commercial sheep destroyed by dogs. Grants of $200 were made to the Ontario Winter Fair, $200 to the Ottawa Winter Fair, and $200 to the Belgian Relief Fund of the Red Cross, to be expended in woollen goods made in Canada. Mr. R. W. Wade was made secretary and Messrs. Campbell, Stobbie, Whitlaw and Bryan were added to the directorate.

HIGH SCHOOL BEAUTIES

You can talk about your beauties
Of New York and old Paree
Of all your inland villages
And cities by the sea,
If you'd travel Europe far and wide
And o'er Scotland's hills and dells.
You could never find such beauties
As the Walkerton High School bells.

You can gaze on the Madonna,
As she looks so straight and tall,
You can gaze on artist's pictures
On the big class gallerie's wall,
You are bound to think they're pretty
And there're surely up-to-date,
But I tell you they're not in it,
with the Walkerton graduate.

If you stand upon the corner
You will see them trip along
With a smile upon their face
And on their lips a merry song,
See their cheeks! They are like roses
And their teeth are white as pearls,
Oh! I'd love to live in loveland,
With one of Walkerton's High School girls.

—A FRIEND.

The History of the County of Bruce
And of The
Minor Municipalities Therein
(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)
Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps,
Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

The mill pond at the Aetna Mills presents a scene of unusual activity these days. Ice cutting operations commenced last Friday morning, and a trainload of thirteen cars of ice per day is harvested. About twenty men are employed at present, and the force will be doubled shortly. Three hundred carloads will be shipped from this village.—Mildmay Gazette.

DEMAND FOR HORSES

That the drain upon the supply of horses occasioned by the war, will be followed when the war is over by an unprecedented demand for remounts was the gist of the report presented at the annual meeting of the Clydesdale Horse Association last week. The general depression and the falling off in the lumber business had resulted in a falling demand for heavy horses but the withdrawal of so many light horses for the war would result thought the directors in the use of heavier breeds to a larger extent commercially. Prices have already advanced and the prediction was made that Scotland may soon be looking to Canada for a supply of breeding stock.

WHERE ARE THE MEN.

Brussels Post—In printing Topic Cards for Young People's Societies we have been struck with the preponderance of young ladies on these programs as compared with young men. It's a fine thing to see the maidens busy in the vine-yard but where are the young men and boys who are preparing for leadership in the churches? The older men will soon pass off the stage of action and manly young fellows, with intelligence and consecration, should be stepping into the ranks. This is a subject of deep importance and one that the churches are face to face with. Young people in the church can do much to better situations by zealously entering upon a crusade to improve conditions in their congregations by discussion planning and vigorous work. On the shoulders of the older people also rests a share of responsibility and a sharp advance and a more enthusiastic interest might help more than they think. Are you a lifter or a leaner?

YOUR COUNTRY NEEDS YOU FALL IN

What will you lack, sonny, what will you lack,
When the girls line up the street,
Shouting their love to the lads come back
From the foe they rushed to beat?
Will you send a strangled cheer to the sky
And grin till your cheeks are red?
But what will you lack when your mate goes by
With a girl who cuts you dead?

Where will you look, sonny, where will you look
When your children yet to be
Clamour to learn of the part you took
In the war that kept men free?
Will you say it was nought to you if France
Stood up to her foe or funked?
But where will you look when they give the glance
That tells you they know you funked?

How will you fare, sonny, how will you fare
In the far-off winter night,
When you sit by the fire in an old man's chair
And your neighbors talk of the fight?
Will you slink away, as it were from a blow,
Your old head shamed and bent?
Or say, I was not with the first to go,
But I went, thank God, I went.

Why do they call, sonny, why do they call
For men who are brave and strong?
Is it nought to you if your country fall,
And Right is smashed by Wrong?
Is it football still and picture show,
The pub and the betting odds,
When your brothers stand to the tyrant's blow,
And Britain's call is God's?

THE WOMAN'S SOAP

Many large employers of labor in Canada and the United States have for years been making it a strict rule in business not to engage a cigarette smoker but if men in their employ are addicted to the habit they are not dismissed but never promoted. If, however, they are let out they are never reengaged. In view of this handicap against the cigarette smoker is it not well to protect young boys from contracting the habit?

DIED IN CARRICK.

William Brighton Gray, an old resident of the Township of Howick, passed away on Monday of this week at the home of his son-in-law, Mr. Charles Nickel, on the third concession of Carrick. Deceased came to Carrick about six months ago, and had been ailing for some time. Four days before his death he was unconscious, and death came to him while in that condition. He was 76 years of age, and enjoyed the highest respect of all his acquaintances. The funeral takes place this afternoon to the Wroxeter cemetery.—Mildmay Gazette.

NO HONEY PRODUCED

During 1914 instructions and material for conducting co-operative experiments in beekeeping were sent to 311 bee keepers by the Provincial Apiarist, Mr. Morley Pettit of the Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph. The season of 1914 will go down in the history of Ontario beekeeping as the poorest for honey production ever known. Bees wintered better than usual and a better spring for building up could not be desired. In some sections clover bloomed profusely but there was very little honey anywhere. The average crop reported for the Province was about 10 lbs per colony as opposed to an average of over 100 lbs per colony in 1913. As usual the average crop reported by experimenters is much better than the general average the experimenters reporting on their crops having a 35 lb average. This will of course be modified by the fact that many experimenters became discouraged and sent no report, but the fact remains that the careful beekeeper always secures better returns than his indifferent neighbor.

STORY OF ST. VALENTINE

Long ago there lived a priest by the name of Valentine. This good man was noted in all the country side for his kindness. He nursed the sick, comforted the sorrowing and gave help to anyone who was in need. He loved the children, and those who went to him for help or comfort were never turned away. After a time this kind priest became too old to go about among his people. He was very sad because he could no longer be of any help to them, but he remembered that he could write loving messages to them. Soon his friends began to watch for the kind words that were sure to come whenever sorrow or gladness entered their homes, and even little children would say when they were sick, "I think Father Valentine will send us a letter to-day." But after a time no more letters came, and soon the news went abroad that good old Valentine was dead. Then everyone said that so kind a man was good enough to be called a saint, and from that day he has been known as St. Valentine. It is nice to still send the kind messages, and not one of those hideous pictures that deborate so many of the shop windows, messages of spite and hate which the senders dare not put their name to nor wish it to be known who sent the spiteful insult.

A NEWSPAPER CAMPAIGN

War has been declared. The Signal has been flashed from Goderich East and West over the Globe. The Courier carried The News to the Lucknow Sentinel, who immediately went on duty. All the newspapers flocked around the Blyth Standard, W. H. Kerr sticking to his Post. A grand Review was conducted by Col Hugh Clark, Ripley Expressed its admiration of the military genius of the Scientific American. Martial music was furnished by Harper's Weekly, the Orange Sentinel was warming itself over the Catholic Register who was ordered to relieve the Lucknow Sentinel who had nothing to eat but Tit Bits while on duty. The Farmer's Advocated that supplies be secured from a Canadian Farm. The battle was seen to commence through the Walkerton Telescope by the Hensall Observer. The first line of defence was held by the Sarnia Post and ammunition was served from Munsey's magazine as Everybody's Magazine was empty. A sad accident occured when the Pioneer was accidently hit by a Government Bullet-in the eve. Calgary got an Eye Opener and the Missionary Outlook now clearly saw the enemy. So an Advance was ordered from Wingham. Onward was the War Cry. A terrible battle now ensued in which the enemy were almost cut to pieces by the Saturday Blade. They rallied, but were finally put to rout by a terrific Punch from London. The Milverton Sun went down and as the last Sunbeams faded Saturday Night came on. The Christian Guardian leaned up against the Saturday Evening Post and kept watch over the field which was dark save for the light of the Toronto and Goderich Stars. At last peaceful Times and a New Era dawned around Wingham and Clinton.

(Intended for last week)

Mrs. Jos Zinger of Berlin who has been visiting relatives here, left on Monday of last week, for her home.

Jacob Lehman who has been ill for about three weeks, is on the road to recovery again.

Mrs. J. B. Goetz and Mrs. John Vogt were visitors in Mildmay on Monday last.

Mr. Sev. Fedy left for Berlin last week to resume his studies in St. Jerome's College.

Mrs. J. H. Schefter Sundayed with J. T. Benninger in Carrick.

Mr. and Mrs. Conney Zinger left for Regina, Sask. last week, Monday.

Herman Weiss sold his thoroughbred stallion last week.

Mr. Jul. Noll who took seriously ill last Saturday is still very feeble.

Married—On Tuesday J. Klein of Sask to Miss Genevieve Bildstein: daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Bildstein of Formosa. Mr. Klein is a son of the late Michael and Mrs. Klein of Chepstow.

"Well, Father Can Play"

Yes, better than he ever thought possible! All the years that he has spent unable to play have been storing up a great fund of memories, and now that the

with the wonderful Meister-Touch Action has set his musical heart free from his untrained fingers, he finds himself able to give wonderful expression to whatever he plays.

He can play "Rule Britannia" or the "Marseillaise" with so much vigor and go that one's feet start marching whether or no, and to every other kind of music he brings the same genuine understanding of latent talent.

This superb instrument is the very finest example of player-piano making. Its tone—its control of time and melody—its appearance—all are unexcelled.

PATRIOTISM and PRODUCTION

The Empire's Call to Farmers

"Approximately twenty million men have been mobilized in Europe. A large proportion of these have been withdrawn from the farms of the countries at war. Even in neutral countries large numbers of food producers have been called from the land to be ready for emergencies. It is difficult for us to realize what will be the effect on food production through the withdrawal of several million men from all the great agricultural countries of Europe. These millions cease to be producers, they have become consumers, —worse still, they have become destroyers of food."

HON. MARTIN BURRELL, Minister of Agriculture.

Britain must have food—food this year, and food next year. Britain is looking to Canada to supply most of that food. We are sending our surplus now, but we must prepare for a larger surplus this year and next year. Patriotism and Production must go hand in hand

Because of this need of the Empire for more food, and the call to Canada in that need, the Canadian Department of Agriculture has arranged for a series of Conferences throughout the Dominion with the object of giving suggestions as to the best ways of increasing production of the particular products needed at this time. At these conferences agricultural specialists, who have studied agricultural conditions and production throughout the world, and the best means of increasing agricultural production in Canada, will give valuable information and suggestions to the farmers, live-stock men, dairymen, poultrymen, vegetable growers, and other producers of this country. The Canadian Department of Agriculture urges you to attend as many of these Conferences as possible, also to watch for other information on the subject that will be given in other announcements in this newspaper.

ATTEND YOUR CONFERENCE

Put Energy into Production of Staple Foods

The Government does not ask farmers to work harder, so much as it urges them to make their work more productive, and to produce those staple foods that the Empire most needs and that can be most easily stored and transported.

Europe, and particularly Britain, will need the following staple foods from Canada more than ever before:—

Wheat, oats, corn, beans, peas.
Beef, mutton, bacon and ham.
Cheese and butter.
Poultry and eggs.
Vegetables, such as potatoes, onions, and turnips.

The larger the yield of these staple food products, the greater the service to the Empire. Germany in the last ten years has doubled the average yield of the majority of her field crops largely through better seed, thorough cultivation and use of fertilizer. And while the Empire's armies are busy putting down German Militarism, let us at home appropriate the best of Germany's agricultural methods for the Empire's advantage.

The Government urges farmers, stockmen, dairymen and other producers to make a wider use of the Free Bulletins issued by the Canadian Department of Agriculture. Clip out, fill in and mail the coupon below and get a list of these bulletins. Then select the bulletins that will be of value to you. Mail your coupon right now. Do not put a stamp on the envelope. Your coupon will be "On His Majesty's Service."

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

CHAMPION GERMAN LIE.

First place among all the fantastic lies about England still filling the columns of the German press belongs undoubtedly to a paragraph, now merrily making the rounds, entitled "London Without Cats." Purporting to deal with England's disastrous shortage of furs, it essays in all seriousness to make Germans believe that the streets of London have become the scene of weird cat-hunts for the purpose of securing "cat-skin imitations of real furs." Here is a delicious taradiddle verbatim:

"Notwithstanding the war and all its anxieties people in London are worrying their heads just now over the whereabouts of the many cats which used to be in evidence there. To meet a cat in London has really become a rare thing. The reason for the disappearance of the cats is the heavy increase in the demand for furs, for the imitation of which cats offer the best material. In consequence of this state of affairs cat-hunting has become a profitable trade for many people. "Poachers" now rush through the streets of London, usually dangling in their hands the sort of meat which cats are fondest of. The cats are then cleverly nabbed and stuck into sacks which the huntsmen carry. How high the price of catskins has risen is shown by the fact that the hide of a Persian cat has increased in cost from eight to twelve shillings. Snow-white catskins have risen from two to three shillings, and the usual house cat is worth from 1s 6d to 2s 6d more.

TRADE STILL BOOMING.

In spite of the effects of five months' war British trade has had another "billion" year, "billion" being taken in the American sense of a thousand millions instead of the strictly accurate English meaning of a million millions.

The figures for our over-sea trade last year, published on Thursday last week, showed that the total was still well over the "billion." The totals since the first "billion" year, 1906, are given below.

Compared with 1913, the decrease of our total trade was £180,402,105. The decrease of imports was £71,302,090, British exports declined by £95,014,-584.

Month by month imports have been rising since the low-water mark of the year, the August war-month. Those for December were £11,567,902 above the imports of November, and were only £3,559,914 below December of 1913. British exports dropped heavily in August and then rose in September and again in October, falling in November. They rose again in December, exceeding the November exports by £1,677,309, but showing a decrease of £17,047,992 compared with December, 1913.

87 TRIPPERS FOR BERLIN.

Eighty-seven recruits have been obtained by Private D. Sherriff, 4th Battalion the Buffs, stationed at Canterbury, by means of a small poster he had printed containing a humorous exhortation copied from the Daily Mail.

Here is the placard:

TO BERLIN.
The country is arranging a trip to Germany in the spring for a few
SPORTSMEN.
All hotel expenses and rail fares paid.
Good shooting and hunting.
Ages 18-33. Rifles and ammunition supplied free.
CHEAP TRIP UP THE RHINE.
Apply at once, as there is only a limited number (one million) required.

Private Sherriff sells copies at a penny and gives the proceeds to one of the war funds.

ANOTHER V. C. HERO.

The London Gazette announces that the King has been pleased to approve of the grant of the Victoria Cross to No. 7079, Bandsman Thomas Edward Rendle, 1st Battalion Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, for conspicuous bravery on Nov. 20, near Wulverghem, when he attended to the wounded under very heavy shell and rifle fire, and rescued men from the trenches, in which they had been buried by the blowing in of the parapets by the fire of the enemy's heavy howitzers.

3,000 MILLION TONS OF RAIN.

Lord Desborough, presiding at a meeting of the Thames Conservancy, said that the rainfall over the Thames basin for nine weeks ended January 5 was 12.36 in., equal to a fall of 3,015 million tons, or 682,507 million gallons of water over the 3,812 square miles of the Thames basin.

This was the highest rainfall over the whole of the Thames Valley for an equal period during the 31 years that records had been kept.

SHELLS BY ACCIDENT.

Alarm was caused in Gourock, Firth of Clyde, early on Wednesday morning week by two shells from big guns dropping in the town. Inquiry showed that an incoming vessel ignored the Admiralty examination boat, and passed on up the Firth. Two warning shots were fired across the bow of the vessel from Fort Portkil.

One of the shells struck a large tenement building in Gourock, doing little damage, but caused much excitement; the other passed over the houses and burst in a field.

RUGBY INTERNATIONAL KILLED.

News has been received at Liverpool that Lieut. F. H. Turner, Liverpool Scottish, the well-known rugby footballer, has been killed in action. At Oxford he captained the University fifteen, and played for Scotland as a forward on several occasions, once leading the side against England. Last season he was captain of the Liverpool Rugby Club.

NOTES.

The death has occurred at Ecclesfield of Mr. George Green, aged 84, formerly owner of the Ecclesfield Iron Foundry.

The death rate in the nine great towns of England and Wales last week averaged 19.4 per thousand of the population.

The death occurred of Mr. Ernest Roebuck, aged 36, of Wortley road, High Green. The deceased, who was highly respected in the district, had acted as secretary to the High Green Workingmen's Club for the last twelve years.

A Sheffield man who deserted from the 14th Hussars ten years ago surrendered to the police, and when before the city magistrates stated that he "could not hold off any longer" when the call of King and country was so strong.

Frederick William Butler, 52, shunter, of 29 Brown street, Masboro, was killed by being run over when engaged in the Thrybergh railway sidings.

An application was made at Rotherham to strike off the list Ye Old Club, North Anston. It was stated that, owing to the members having enlisted and the beer tax, the club could not be kept going. The application was granted.

Mrs. Ellis, of Osgoldby, near Selby, wife of a laborer, has given birth to triplets.

Over 700 men who had been in the employ of the Yorkshire Main Colliery Co. have joined the colors. This is nearly half the complement employed.

The Buxton Urban Council has appointed as baths manager Mr. James Merton Scott, assistant in the town clerk's department, Dundee, at a salary of £200. There were over 150 applicants for the post.

The Bakewell magistrates have issued an order that all public houses within a three-mile radius of the village of Baslow shall be open to soldiers only from noon to 1 p.m. and from 6 to 9 p.m. on all days of the week.

The death has occurred in London of Mr. H. Lane Wilson, the well-known baritone and composer of popular songs, aged 4.

Mr. Thomas Wicks, the veteran cathedral chorister, who took part in three coronations, has died at Wells. He had lived under six monarchs and had sung before four of them.

The death has taken place at his residence in Retford market square of Mr. Charles James Merryweather, at the age of 72. The deceased was one of Retford's most prominent tradesmen.

Mr. Fred Winter, the author of the words of the song, "The Rosary," died recently. He had been a patient in the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Putney Heath for nearly ten years.

The manager of the Queen's Hotel, Harrogate, Mr. Heyden, died on Saturday week, in his 61st year. Mr. Heyden, who was a naturalized German and came to the Queen's Hotel as a waiter about 37 years ago, was 6 feet 5 inches tall, and proportionately built.

Lord Feversham died at his residence, Duncombe Park, Helmsley, Yorkshire, on Wednesday week, in his 84th year. Lord Feversham is succeeded by his grandson, Viscount Helmsley, who has represented the Thirsk and Malton division of Yorkshire since 1906. A parliamentary vacancy is thus created.

Mr. Ellis Griffith, K. C., M. P., announced his intention to resign his post as Under-Secretary for the Home Office at a meeting of the executive of the Anglesey Liberal Association. Two years ago he accepted office to give his assistance in carrying the Welsh Church bill through the Commons. Now that this has been accomplished Mr. Griffith—who was formerly leader of the North Wales and Chester circuit—is resuming his professional work at the bar.

The cause of some alarming explosions in the Sydenham road district of Bath is being investigated. In some cases explosions took place at a gas stove, but in others near a sink. When lights were brought there was a bright flash and a loud report, but no serious damage was done. Investigation has shown that there is petrol in the sewers, not due to any leakage from petrol stores, but possibly poured down in small quantities by owners of small cars. Owing to the floods it had not been able to drain away.

Lady Carson, wife of the Ulster leader, opened at Belfast a hospital fitted up and presented to the War Office by the Ulster Unionist Council. After the inauguration Sir Edward Carson addressed the large gathering of Ulster Unionists present.

A young private named Joseph Clarke, who lived near Colchester, after being warned not to go too close to the edge of a cliff 300 feet high at Stoke Fleming, Dartmouth, missed his footing and fell over on to the rocks beneath, being killed instantly. A constable, lowered from the cliff by a rope, recovered the man's body.

Herman Glass, the interned Austrian who pleaded guilty, before a court-martial at Douglas, to having attempted to send to Frau Agnes Glass in Austria, a letter written in invisible ink, has been sentenced to two months' imprisonment. He had written that the interned aliens were treated like pigs.

A strange case in which one sentry fatally shot another has been investigated by the Dover coroner. Both men belonged to the Royal Artillery and were on duty on the Eastern Cliffs, where they had to meet each other. Gunner Gibbs, observing someone moving suspiciously near a fort, challenged three times, and failing to get a reply fired three times. He afterwards found the man he had shot was Gunner Henry Walters. The wounded man said he went beyond the fort as he thought he saw something suspicious. The evidence showed that Walters was deaf. A verdict of Misadventure was returned.

Mrs. Ryland, widow of Mr. Fred Ryland, and younger sister of the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, died at Harborne, Birmingham.

The first step in an attempt to capture the Austrian chair trade is to be taken by High Wycombe manufacturers, who, at the request of the Board of Trade, will exhibit at Cheapside, London, British-made chairs of a special design. The idea has been to make chairs at competitive prices which will oust the bentwood specimens.

In five weeks Lieutenant-Colonel Frank Gaskell, the Conservative candidate for South Glamorgan, has raised 1,070 men for the Cardiff City Battalion, which he commands. Colonel Gaskell, who volunteered in August, was wounded in action. Business men have given the battalion its bugles, a goat mascot, two machine guns, and regimental straps and letters.

The late Sir Walter Gilbey's famous stud of shire horses, thoroughbred polo ponies and hunters were disposed of by auction at the paddocks at Elsenham. Mr. Fautel-Phillips gave the top price of 610 guineas for the thoroughbred stallion Stortford. Mr. Cole Ambrose gave 260 guineas for the shire stallion Saxon Draughtsman. The sale realized £5,210.

A catch of plaice made in a three weeks' trip in the White Sea fishing grounds by the Hull trawler Sir James Reckitt is valued at over £3,000, a record figure. A little more than half the catch was sold at Hull for £1,990. The previous record catch, made by the Hull trawler St. Malo, was worth £2,195.

Thomas White, trawler skipper, who was charged with demanding money with menaces to the extent of £1,200 from the Red Cross Fleet, was at Hull committed by the magistrates to an asylum. White issued circulars to fishermen's wives prophesying the loss of trawlers.

An enthusiastic town's meeting of the male citizens of Ipswich, on the proposition of Sir Courtenay Warner, seconded by Sir Frederick Wilson, decided to form a contingent of the Volunteer Training Corps, to be known as the Ipswich National Guard, and the names of 177 citizens were enrolled. Bury St. Edmunds formed a similar corps of 200 men early last week.

Edward Williams, a Deal photographer, was acquitted on a charge of unlawfully displaying in his house a light, which might be used as a signal, without the authorities' permission. Williams said he had no knowledge of signalling; he used a bicycle lamp when he fed his rabbits. He was warned to be more careful in future.

Great floods in the fenlands of Southwest Norfolk have been caused by the bursting of the banks of the Little Ouse at Hockwold. Nearly sixty families have been driven out of their cottages, in many of which nearly five feet of water is standing. These refugees are living now with their neighbors in cottages, some of which are harboring three or four families.

The High Sheriff of Somerset announces that 19,580 men of the county are serving with the colors. The population of the county is 458,025, and the male population of military age, 68,700; thus 2 of every 7 eligible are serving.

Colonel Sheffield Hamilton-Grace, of Frant, near Tunbridge Wells, a veteran of the Crimea, Indian Mutiny, and Maori wars, died lately, in his eighty-first year.

Neath Liberals nominated Mr. T. J. Williams and Mr. Dan Thomas, secretary to Sir Alfred Mond, candidates for the Swansea district vacancy. The final selection will be made at conference on January 30.

Mr. and Mrs. George Pearce, of Bradford-on-Avon, Wilts, celebrated the 72nd anniversary of their wedding. Ten of their twelve children are still living, and the united ages of parents and children amount to 801 years. Mr. Pearce remembers the proclamation of William IV.

A Wolverhampton man named Cox, replying to the Parliamentary Recruiting Committee's circular, stated that he had six sons serving the country—one each in the North and South Staffords, one in the Royal Field Artillery, one in the Territorials, and two in Lord Kitchener's Army. Mr. Cox, who is sixty-three years old and who served eight years in the Army and eight in the Volunteers, says: "I am still willing to serve if called upon."

There is little likelihood of a contest for the parliamentary vacancy caused at Shipley, Yorkshire, by the death of Mr. Percy Illingworth. The Liberal selection will probably be between Mr. C. F. G. Masterman and Sir James Roberts, owner of the alpaca works and model town of Saltaire.

Charles Wynn Ellis, the well-known sporting artist, has died in a nursing home at Shanklin at the age of sixty-three. He was the nephew of the late Sir Walter Gilbey and a native of Bishop's Stortford.

An office-boy named Sidney George Clements, aged fifteen, was found guilty of murder at the Old Bailey. His little stepbrother, aged seven, was the victim; he had been stabbed with a carving knife.

Four tugs and four barges broke from their moorings in the Thames close to Kingston Bridge on Saturday week and were carried down stream. One tug went over Teddington Weir, damaging it, and later knocked several pieces out of the archway on the lower part of Richmond Bridge and damaged a lock gate before it was secured. A second tug sank below Kingston Bridge, a third came to rest athwart Teddington Weir with its funnel stove in, and the fourth was secured below Kingston Bridge. Two of the barges sank.

Lord Rosebery has been appointed Captain-General of the Royal Company of Scottish Archers in succession to the late Duke of Buccleuch.

The London theatres are enjoying such a wave of prosperity as might be expected only in times of peace. Twenty-eight theatres are now open in the West End with every class of theatrical attraction, from skits to Shakespeare, and nearly all of them—a most rare occurrence—are doing profitable business.

Mr. John A. L. Gillmoor, a special constable, was guarding a bridge the other night at Camberwell, when a woman, with some anxiety, came to ask him if at 5.30 a.m. he would be good enough to call at a certain number in the New-road and give two knocks to awake her husband, who had overslept the previous morning.

Lord Estcourt died on Tuesday week at Estcourt House, Tetbury, Gloucestershire, in his seventy-sixth year. Lord Estcourt was the first baron, being created in 1903, but his family had been at Estcourt since the fourteenth century. Lord Ingestre, only son and heir of the Earl of Shrewsbury, died on Friday week at his London residence, 20, New Cavendish street, W., of pneumonia, following on influenza.

Major-General John Edward Boyes, C. B., retired, died at Mentone on Monday week, aged seventy-one. He entered the Army in 1861, saw a great deal of fighting in Egypt with the Gordon Highlanders, and commanded an infantry brigade in the South African War.

Returning home after shopping, Mrs. Miller, the wife of a working-man at Greenock, found her house in flames. Undeterred by the dense smoke, she entered the house. After a few moments she returned to the street carrying her little boy, aged three. Placing him in the care of people around the house, she again rushed through the smoke and flames to rescue her second son, aged four. She did not return and was only rescued after great difficulty by a fireman. Her second son was dead when brought from the house. The younger boy was burned, but the mother escaped serious injury.

The Slow, Sluggish, Torpid Action of the Liver is Responsible for Many Ills.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills stimulate the sluggish liver, clean the coated tongue, sweeten the obnoxious breath, clean away all waste and poisonous matter from the system, and prevent as well as cure all complaints arising from a liver which has become inactive.

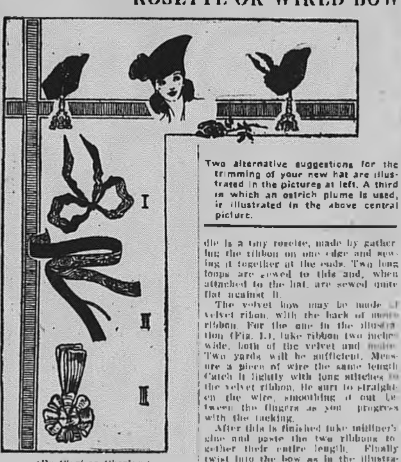
Mr. Victor B. McNeills, [illegible], Alta., writes: "I thought I would write and tell you of my experience with Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, as I am greatly pleased with the results I received by using them. I was troubled with sick headaches for a long time, and would get so sleepy right after I ate my dinner that I could not do any work. A friend of mine, from Toronto, visited me last summer and he asked me to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. He told me they had done him so much good for his stomach. I used several vials, and I found they did me so much good that I can recommend them to any one suffering from liver trouble."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

SMARTEST HATS HAVE SIMPLEST TRIMMING--USE SILVER ROSETTE OR WIRED BOW



Two alternative suggestions for the trimming of your new hat are illustrated in the pictures at left. A third in which an ostrich plume is used, is illustrated in the above central picture.

(By Clarissa Chesley.)

Any good milliner will tell you that the trimmings of a hat are merely incidental. In the last two years there has been less ornamentation used than ever before.

The great point is to make the lines of the hats practically perfect. The hat in the illustration, for instance, will be just as becoming without a stitch of trimming if one can wear it at all.

The simplest of the trimmings and possibly the most chic is the little silver ribbon rosette (Fig. 3). It is about nine inches in circumference and has nine little loops. In the middle is a tiny rosette, made by gathering the ribbon on one edge and sewing it together at the ends. Two long loops are sewed to this and, when attached to the hat, are sewed quite flat against it.

The velvet bow may be made of velvet ribbon, with the back of moire ribbon. For the one in the illustration (Fig. 1), take ribbon two inches wide, both of the velvet and moire. Two yards will be sufficient. Measure a piece of wire the same length. Catch it lightly with long stitches to the velvet ribbon. Be sure to straighten the wire, smoothing it out between the fingers as you progress with the tacking.

After this is finished take milliner's glue and paste the two ribbons together their entire length. Finally twist into the bow as in the illustration, shaping it in the little flukes artistically. It can be posed in a number of ways on the hat, but the one shown on the completed hat is as well liked as any.

Those wired bows are the latest type for hat trimmings and will be worn all spring.

A black or a white plume may be used instead of the bow or rosette. The white tip would be especially chic if black velvet is used for the facing.

The next and final step is to put in the lining. The concluding lesson will describe how this is done.

The Tragedy Of War Seen at Dunkirk

(Fortnightly Review.)

What a war this is! Staying at Dunkirk we feel as if we had taken up our quarters in a camp, for soldiers are in cheerful possession of the city. Dunkirk has become a "soldiers' tavern!" We wake in the morning to the sound of heavy ammunition waggons rumbling slowly through the town on their way to the front—we fall asleep at night to the same music. The streets are crowded with French troops. The Headquarters Staff occupy the Hotel de Ville—the military note prevails everywhere. Trains arrive at all hours of the day and night bringing up fresh relays of troops, mostly French soldiers, for the front; the station is strictly guarded; no one is allowed to enter or leave it without a military pass; infinite and most necessary precautions are taken against espionage.

There is not a bed to be had for love or money in the town—the city is packed with troops to its utmost capacity. English lads in khaki—such tall, well set up young men; dashing French officers, gorgeous, gorgeous in their blue uniforms; dusky-skinned Turcos, Belgian soldiers—dogged, determined fellows; stately, dignified Indians: all these men have found quarters here. The dark, dingy town hardly knows itself. The hotels and restaurants do a roaring trade. Immense animation prevails amongst the troops—this is the bright side of war.

The Hotel des Arcades is a great gathering place—the social centre; everyone meets everyone here at dejeuner, and it is difficult to secure a table in the big upstairs restaurant. Distinguished French and Belgian generals and English staff officers drop in for half an hour, snatch a little food and depart. Great ladies who are working at the various base hospitals sometimes make their appearance—Red Cross nurses partake of a hurried dejeuner.

The menu is as varied is possible, but it is becoming increasingly difficult to get any green vegetables, nor is it the least use to ask for soda-water, lemonade or ginger beer—the supplies have long since been finished.

Two things impressed us particularly at Dunkirk, the depression and apathy of the civil population in contrast to the cheerfulness of the military and the extraordinary attendance at the Cathedral services, the sacred edifice being crowded to suffocation and not only with French and Belgian soldiers, but with a fair sprinkling of British. Anything more moving could hardly be imagined than the sight of this huge gathering of men at their devotions, men who knew that they might be called upon to meet their God in a few days' time—a few hours. It was a great spiritual experience to kneel in a dark corner of the Cathedral and join in the service; never did the strength and force of religion come more home.

Another poignant moment was when we suddenly encountered a long funeral procession making its slow way through the town. A cross-bearer, carrying a big silver cross, preceded the plumed hearses, the twelve hearses that followed each other in such mournful order down the cobbled road. Flowers rested on two or three of the coffins, but each coffin was covered by a flag, the colors the dead soldier had fought under—the British flag, the French, the Belgian—they all passed by in turn.

Taubes constantly hover over Dunkirk—bombs are sometimes thrown out, but as yet they have done no great damage, and the townsfolk regard the Taubes with more annoyance than fear. They are part and parcel of the general discomfort that prevails—the general upheaval; they belong to war time. We regarded each Taube we saw with a certain degree of apprehension ourselves, but that may have been because we had not yet become accustomed to them.

No civilian can enter Dunkirk without a military pass, nor leave the town without one. A strict cordon has been drawn round the city—a necessary cordon, the military authorities are in supreme command. But not till we were driving to Furnes did we really feel close to war—not till we had heard the heavy booming of the cannons.

The road that leads to the trenches—we saw it first on a grey November afternoon—a cold, freezing afternoon. The sun hung like a ball of fire in the grey sky, the tall trees waved thin skeleton boughs. The grey road that armies have tramped over, its long and broken before us, marred by deep ruts made by heavy ammunition waggons, cut up by the hoofs of cavalry. Soldiers were marching along as we flashed past them in the car, a plodding detachment of French soldiers. They must have felt fearfully cold, for the wintry blast cut like a knife; but they looked as if they were ready to endure any amount of hardship. France has certainly good reason to be proud of her sons, her indefatigable army. In fact, the whole nation has behaved magnificently during these weeks of supreme trial. France has vindicated herself no less than England. She is a new France, a lofty mother of men, nor has she been sparing with her troops—backward in helping her Allies.

It is a fact to be remembered that from the day when General Joffre turned and faced the Germans south of the Marne the French have kept their line. Their losses have been tremendous, but fresh troops have always arrived to replace the dead. As the Allied line extended to the sea French troops were sent to strengthen that line; when the British forces were hard pressed French troops hurried to their help. France has done her duty nobly; nor has she made the least boast about it. She holds at least three-quarters of the line, but she is very silent about her troops' achievements—her reticence is almost extraordinary.

But everything is extraordinary in this war! Who would have believed a year ago that an innocent neutral State like Belgium could have been ruthlessly invaded and practically put to the sword by a so-called civilized nation—a nation who have made a boast of their culture?

But it has happened. Belgium's blood cries for vengeance from the ground—Belgium's wrongs have inflamed the world, her frightful wrongs that can never be redressed, for not only has a happy, peaceful, and prosperous land been utterly ruined, and financial losses to the extent of close on £212,067,000 inflicted on a distressed country—Belgium has had a greater agony to undergo. She has witnessed, not only the death of her soldiers and the slaughter of unarmed citizens, but the rape of her women—the mutilation of her children.

No pen can write, no words can fittingly describe, the ruin that the invaders have made of Belgium—the miles and miles of desolation surrounding the battle line. The smell of death is in the very air, of decay, corruption. The troops in the trenches sicken and vomit when the wind blows in a certain direction; a rain of blood has ruined next year's harvest—the land has been broken and shattered like a reed.

Visit the waste places, the demolished towns! Nieuport's crumbling houses bear tragic witness to the panic that took place when the fierce bombardment began, and the aged and the women and the children had to flee from their homes. There is a little villa standing just outside ruined Nieuport, a villa with a pretty garden, identical with scores of the same sort of villa residence to be found in England. Some young wife must have fled from here in fear of her life only a few weeks back, leaving all her possessions behind her—her cherished household gods. Withered flowers still fill the vases in the drawing-room—madame's dresses hang in the wardrobe of her large comfortable bedroom. In the nursery—such a bright, cheerful nursery—baby fingers have carefully arranged a procession of Noah's Ark animals on the floor. A big brown Teddy bear has been dropped by the door—perhaps the child playing with the Teddy bear was snatched from the ground in a hurry; be sure there was no time to waste.

Ypres is a smoking ruin; the famous law court of Louvain a heap of ashes. Villages have been burnt down, factories destroyed; hardly a farm, villa, or chateau has been left standing. The wrong done to Belgium vindicates the attitude of our armies in their determination to fight on till they have trampled out the last spark of life in the German fire-brand, for Belgium has got to be avenged. It is not fitting—it is not decent—it is not even possible, that a vast power could be allowed to ruthlessly demolish a God-fearing, respectable, honest little country and expect to escape just punishment. The men who first unsheathed the lightning blade of war have got to perish by the sword—this is inevitable justice; they have brought about their own doom.

The Germans drank "der Tag," and the Day has come. It was ushered in by a blood-red dawn. It will end in a dark night. Our foes, when making long and stealthy preparations for a war which they knew—none better—would convulse Europe and cause rivers of innocent blood to flow, forgot that following swiftly on their Day of ruthless aggression might flash the Day of the Lord—the day that cometh like a thief in the night. They deliberately unloosed war upon the earth, and this is their reward—to be devoured by war.

The allies have become, and they know it, the avengers of blood. They have a nation to avenge, also they have their own countries to protect—their wives and their children, their old parents, their household gods. They recognize that it is their business at the present moment to kill, and to go on killing, as many Germans as they possibly can—to shoot straight—to hold the line at all costs—to fight till they drop dead; but it is impossible to believe that a single man fighting in the allied trenches at the present moment would wish this war to continue if he were not absolutely convinced that no lasting peace can be obtained—no great universal peace—till the German eagle's claws have been cut, till Germany has become a conquered and impotent nation.

This war has surely destroyed the last illusions about war. War as conducted on modern principles must be regarded as organized murder. The mere idea of two long lines of attacking forces shelling each other relentlessly, vindictively, day after day, night after night—men who rarely catch a glimpse of each other's faces, remember—has something terrible about it, sinister. This is not the warm, virile, splendid hand-to-hand fighting of the past, it is too cold-blooded—too mechanical, it is strained, unnatural. Neither can the practice of throwing down bombs from air machines over villages, towns and hospitals, be commended. Why should the civil population be ruthlessly butchered? What right has war, even in the name of war, to commit such crimes?

No; the soldiers who are fighting in this battle at the present moment—the greatest battle that the world has ever known—would be very loth to think that it is at all likely that their sons or their grandsons would ever be drawn into a similar conflict. It is for the world's peace they are fighting as much as for anything else—the peace of the future, the peace of the unborn generations, for they know, these men, what war is like. Not a single horror has been spared them. Ghastly pictures have been imprinted on their brains—pictures which they will never forget. They have seen war in its most terrible aspect, naked, bloody war.

They have watched the smoke go up from scores of ruined homes—ablaze—crumbling towns; they have witnessed the wanton destruction of God's temples. They have encountered fugitive Belgian women fleeing from outrage; they have seen with their own eyes slaughtered children. They have found—oh, the pity of it!—crazed and half-demented old peasants hiding amongst the ruins of their shattered cottages—old folk whose broken lives can never be mended. The smell of death has got into their very nostrils; and now winter has suddenly descended upon the land—our troops are fighting winter as well as war.

And what a fight they have put up in the trenches—what a marvellous, amazing, never-to-be-forgotten fight! No Arthurian knights, no paladins of mediaeval history, none of the Elizabethan gentlemen adventurers, none of the seventeenth century soldiers of fortune had to undergo half the terrors our soldiers have undergone. Our so-called effete generation has been tested in a fiery furnace and has stood the test superbly; our men have proved themselves.

They ran singing and laughing into battle. They sang as they ran "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary." They didn't know what they were in for—they had no idea, but they know now.

They have crouched for long hours at a time in trenches knee-deep with water. They have suffered frightfully from sciatica, rheumatism and neuralgia, and now they are beginning to learn what frost-bite means. They have lived in trenches for seventy-two hours without a break, and the smell in these trenches is appalling, as no one can move out and there is very often no communication trench. Their ears have been deafened day and night by the noise of "coal-boxes," shrapnel, and "Jack Johnsons." They have grown accustomed to the shrieking "mew-ow" of shells. In many instances they have been unable to bury their own dead, because the British and German trenches sometimes lie only thirty yards apart. They have witnessed the corpses of their pals rotting under their very eyes; they have drunk of a bitter cup.

But when the cry goes down the line—the long, long line, "Are we down-hearted?" the men thunder back a three "No!" Why, it was only the other day that a dying soldier in the trenches—an English Tommy—pulled himself to his feet, stood up, bloody from face to heel, and shouted out passionately with his last breath, "Are we down-hearted? No!"

They have an equally fine tale to tell about a French soldier up at the Belgian Field Hospital at Furnes. One of the doctors there told us the anecdote himself. He explained that a little French soldier had been brought in a week back—a lad upon whom it was necessary to operate at once, owing to the gangrenous nature of his wound.

The patient stood the operation fairly well, but on recovering from the anaesthetic he was feverishly anxious to know if he was with his comrades, his allies or a prisoner in German hands, and his joy, his satisfaction, was supreme when he was told that he was in the Belgian Field Hospital, safe with the English.

"Thanks be to le bon Dieu, I am with my comrades!" he exclaimed. "Now I am quite happy—now I am content!"

The doctors and the nurses made a brave fight to save this boy's life, but he gradually sank. All that human skill and medical science could do was done for him, but in vain. The young Frenchman realized that he was dying, but he was quite cheerful.

"I am only a little French soldier," he remarked to Dr. Renton. "But I am glad—very glad—to give my life for France."

He died three hours later. He had been lying quite still on his bed, apparently unconscious, but just before the end came he raised himself—he sat up erect in bed and cried out in a voice that rang through the ward like a clarion note: "Vive la France!" The next second he fell back dead.

YOU SHOULD BE AFRAID OF A COUGH OR COLD.

Coughs and colds do not call for a minute recital of symptoms as they are well known to everyone, but their dangers are not so well known. All the most serious affections of the throat, the lungs and the bronchial tubes are, in the beginning, but coughs and colds.

Many people when they contract a slight cold do not pay any attention to it, thinking perhaps that it will pass away in a day or two. The upshot is that before they know it, it has settled on their lungs.

Too much stress cannot be laid on the fact that on the first sign of a cough or cold it must be gotten rid of immediately, as failure to do this may cause years of suffering from serious lung trouble.

DR. WOOD'S NORWAY PINE SYRUP

will cure the cough or cold and prove a preventative from all throat and lung troubles such as bronchitis, pneumonia and consumption.

Mrs. B. R. Druce, Brighton, Ont., writes: "I am sending you my testimony of your Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, telling you what it did for my little girl. The doctor had given her up as she was, as we thought, going into a decline with the cough she had. I was told by a lady friend to try "Dr. Wood's" and when she had taken two bottles she was on her feet again, and four bottles cured her."

Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup is the best cure for coughs and colds. It is put up in a yellow wrapper; three pine trees the trade mark; the price, 25c and 50c; manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

As to Amazons.

Not a few fancy horseback riding for women is comparatively new. To be sure our great-grandmothers rode on pillions, but they were of a day when it was the fashion to be delicate. Later the sex took up riding, sidewise of course—but now many ride across just as did the Amazons of old. Although having the Amazon River for namesake, these doughty dames are supposed to have come from the country about the Caucasus, their chief seats being along a river which empties into the Black Sea. They invaded at various times Thrace, Asia Minor, islands of the Aegean, Greece, Syria, Arabia, Egypt and Libya.

The ninth labor of Hercules was to take from them the girdle of the Queen of the Amazons. It was a very unpleasant affair, as you no doubt remember. Instead of showing fight, Hippolyta was sensible of his manly charms and gave him her girdle without a struggle and even went boating with him.

Juno took alarm, warned the Amazons that their Queen was being carried off, and they descended upon the ship. Thinking Hippolyta had been treacherous, Hercules slew her and sailed away with the girdle.

So much for the Amazons.

Coins for Lepers.

The Philippine Government has minted a special coinage for use in the Culion leper colony. The coins are of aluminum and include pieces of 1 peso and 20, 10, 5, 1 1-2 centavos. They are accepted at face value for all business carried on within the colony but are of no value elsewhere.

DON'T HAWK, SPIT, SNEEZE, CURE YOURSELF! BREATHE "CATARRHOZONE"!

Gives Instant Relief, Clears Out Nose, Throat and All Breathing Organs.

In this fickle climate, repeated colds very easily drift into Catarrh.

The natural tendency of Catarrh is to extend through the system in every direction.

Exposure to cold or dampness intensifies the trouble and nasal catarrh is the result.

Unless a complete cure is effected, inflammation passes rapidly to the throat, bronchial tubes and then to the lungs.

In using Catarrhozone you don't take medicine into the stomach—you just breathe a healing piney vapor direct to the lungs and air passages.

The purest balsams and the greatest antiseptics are thus sent to every spot where catarrhal trouble exists, germs are killed, foul secretions are destroyed, nature is given a chance and cure comes quickly.

Colds and throat troubles can't last if the pure healing vapor of Catarrhozone is breathed,—sneezing and coughing cease at once, because irritation is removed.

Use Catarrhozone to prevent—use it to cure your winter ills. It's pleasant, safe and guaranteed in every case. Complete outfit $1.00. Smaller size 50c. at all dealers.

FARM AND GARDEN

CARE OF THE HEIFER.

Different opinions are held as to the most suitable age for a heifer to produce her first calf, but there are many points which call for consideration in dealing with this matter. A great deal, for instance, depends upon the breed of the animal, the way she has been reared, and the quality of the pastures upon which she is grazed. Some breeders maintain that a heifer calving before she is three years old receives a check to her growth and does not develop into as fine a beast as she otherwise would. From my own experience I consider this entirely erroneous, and personally I prefer a heifer to calve when she is about two and a half years old. If she is well grown and well looked after she will usually develop a good cow, and will in all probability make a better dairy cow than she would in calving at three years of age. Besides, the heifer is making a money return six months sooner. This is an important point and should be taken into consideration. At the same time, I am no advocate of making money at the expense of the animal's well being, for it proves but poor economy in the long run, and calving at a premature age should not be encouraged.

The autumn is the most suitable time to commence rearing heifer calves for dairy purposes. If brought to calve about April, when two and a half years old, they will have the best of the grazing season before them, and this is a decided advantage. It is not a good plan to rear the first calves, as calves from mature animals are likely to have stronger constitutions. It is better to let the heifers suckle their calves till they are fat, but the udders should be handled twice a day. If they are gently treated there should be no real difficulty in their management after the calves have been removed.

HANDLE THE HEIFER WHILE YOUNG.

It is always advisable to handle heifers and accustom them to being tied up while they are still young; that is to say, before they are put to the bull. Otherwise there is always the risk that they may become unmanageable and very hard to deal with at calving time, but if previously well trained and carefully handled this difficulty should never arise. Judging from what I see and hear, I very often think that more compensation would be had from many cows if greater attention had been paid to their training while heifers. Many ill-natured or defective habits may be traced to omissions or abuses when the cow was in her heifer stage, and more particularly at the time of bringing her first calf. That is a turning point with many, as they either become docile or vicious. Both types are to be found in all herds, and the former benefit by consistent attentions and are lovable and thrifty. So often I find it a custom on farms to put the heifers in the field as yearlings, and they are hardly ever handled from their calf days until they are about to be brought to calve or have actually accomplished it. They are not actually wild in their freedom, but they are far from being tame, and the bringing up of the first calf uncivilizes many. Some are so timid as to become permanently so; others acquire kicking and resentful habits that cling to them all their days, and cause them to be a source of annoyance to the other members of the herd.

There is nothing more short-sighted than delaying handling the heifer till she has calved; it is only the work of the inexperienced and careless. If the heifer's training does not commence when quite young, she should, anyway, be taken in hand a week or two before calving. As she becomes heavy with calf she has a tendency to become docile, but that is not enough. She must be handled and fondled daily. Let her be brought into the shed daily and tied up like the old cows. Give her a general rub down, and rub the udder gently as it distends, also draw the hands over the teats. When she comes to calve I do not say she will be as agreeable as an old cow, but her objections will be only very temporary and the calf will not be two days old before she is as quiet and tractable as she was previous to calving.

The selection of the man to attend to the heifers should not be haphazard, for a soothing hand and a kindly word are very necessary to them. Rough characters should never touch them till their good habits are clenched, nor after that if it can possibly be helped. One hears tales of heifers with first calves beginning to milk very well and suddenly decreasing in a short time. Few if any of these are the trained heifers, but the unbroken and harassed, who never have a chance to settle down to agreeable milk giving. All great milking cows are quiet animals. They stand chewing the cud from first to last, and absolutely enjoy milk-giving; but the nervous are unsettled and uncertain.

Heifers that are never touched till they calve are all troublesome, some terribly so. They often tremble with fear of their attendant, or become ill-natured and obstinate. They will hardly recognize their own offspring; they will hardly allow anybody to milk them, and the calf has often to struggle to meet its wants. Then the udders are sure to go wrong—swell, harden, inflame, fester, etc., which is all exceedingly against establishing a good bag and a fine milker. Even if the calf is put to suck the heifer from the first, there will still be the objections to the human hands; indeed, the more the calf sucks the less amenable the heifer becomes to having her milk removed, and the submission has all to be brought about when she is in milk, a time with many more risks than previous to calving.

JUDGING WORTH BY MILK YIELD.

Big returns cannot be expected from a heifer with her first calf, but they vary astonishingly in accordance with age and breeding. Heifers should never give less than half the quantity of milk secured from a first rate cow. No cow is very profitable in the herd unless she yields from 700 to 800 gallons a year, and a heifer that does not come up to 350 or 400 gallons ought not to be counted on as qualified. I would hesitate to put a heifer to the bull again that gave less than 300 gallons; fattening her for the butcher would be more appropriate. Still I am never ready to condemn a heifer after her first calf, unless sufficient reasons exist for doing so. Many and many a one milks badly on her first trial, but picks up surprisingly with the second, and it is then that her full value can be thoroughly and correctly estimated. A heifer that does not give 500 gallons of milk, at least, with her second calf will never get beyond a moderate cow, and this stamp are not the money-makers.—Farmer and Stockbreeder.

NOTES.

Horse manure is valuable. It contains nitrogen and nitrogen is worth at least eight cents a pound. A horse produces about 15 tons of manure and litter a year containing 130 pounds of nitrogen. Manure keeps best when it is compact and protected from the weather. Liquid manure should be kept separate and not mixed with the dry, or they both deteriorate. In these days when our soils are crying for nitrogen and other ingredients, manure should be jealously guarded.

Dr. Marshall, a Pennsylvania institute speaker, says that whitewashing of dairy barns should be done for the sake of general sanitation, but the main point in the fight against tuberculosis is the elimination of the dark stables and filthy stall conditions. Where clean methods are used in the keeping of cows, he advises the use of a compound made from one pound of chloride of lime and five gallons of whitewash, which, when put on the walls and stable partitions, acts as an effective preventive of disease.

Give a bran mash Saturday night or Sunday noon; and on Wednesday night also, if work is slack. After a long day in very cold or wet weather a hot mash, half-bran and half-oats, with a tablespoonful of ginger, will do the horse good.

Sometimes, when cows are fed on dry feed, the churner finds that her butter will not gather. Experience has taught that a little soda added to the cream when this is the case will almost invariably cause the scattered bits of butter to gather in a mass; and the butter quality is not injured in the least.

There are two ways by which we can increase the supply of beef and at the same time increase our profits from feeding: (1) By breeding more cattle on our farms and increasing their efficiency. (2) By using more care and skill in the combining of foods, so that more beef can be produced from a given quantity of grains and grasses grown.

It All Started From a Bad Cold

Watford Man Found Relief in Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Mr. Robert Taylor, Sr., After Suffering for Two Years, Tells of the Benefits He got from Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Watford, Ont., Feb. 8 (Special).—Mr. Robert Taylor, sr., a very estimable man living here, is telling his friends that the pain in his back, from which he suffered for some time, has disappeared, and that he gives all the credit to Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"My trouble started with a cold," Mr. Taylor states, "and though I was treated by a doctor I got no permanent relief. I had cramps in my muscles and stiffness in my joints, my sleep was broken and unrefreshing and I perspired freely with the least exertion. I had attacks of rheumatism and sciatica, and though I tried many medicines I found no relief till I tried Dodd's Kidney Pills. I must say they were a great benefit to me."

Mr. Taylor's troubles came from his kidneys. The diseased kidneys failed to strain the uric acid out of the blood and the results were as he has stated. Dodd's Kidney Pills put the kidneys in working order, the uric acid was strained out of the blood, and the troubles went with it.

RECOVERY OF WOUNDED MEN.

(London Spectator)

The French Government has issued some remarkable figures showing the percentage of wounded men who have recovered, or are recovering and are, or will be, fit again for service. The figures are taken up to December 1:

Wounded, but fit for almost immediate return to the front	54.50 per cent.
Wounded, and on leave	24.50 per cent.
Wounded, and still in hospital	17.40 per cent.
Permanently disabled and unfit for further service	1.46 per cent.
Wounded, and died from wounds	3.48 per cent.

The enormous proportion of complete recoveries testifies to the humaneness of the modern bullet and to the great skill of the surgeons. But there is another point. It is obvious that in a long war the majority of wounded men will return to the front. When we speak of the casualties of an army we must remember that it would be quite misleading to deduct them bodily from the fighting strength of that army. Casualties nowadays are chiefly temporary casualties.

THE POULTRY WORLD

HOW TO PICK THE HEN.

Practical utility and show-room beauty—these are the two essentials in the selection of breeders for the poultry farm. Utility comes first, for without strength and vitality you cannot hope to have birds that will reproduce themselves. Breed from the largest stock you can get and make your sittings from the largest, pure-white, well-shaped eggs.

The only females considered as breeders are those with long bodies, neck and legs. The comb must be fine and even on the head, conforming in size to the rest of the bird. The first principle in the selection of the male bird is that he must mate well with the flock. He must be compact, with full breast, tail carried low, heavy plumage, long legs, and comb and head the very best obtainable, as upon these depend in great part the comb and head of the chick. Select the male first for shape, second for color; the female first for color, second for shape. In the White Leghorn we look for a blue white, not creamy white, in the shaft feathers.

Well-developed, mature pullets may be used—we have had a certain amount of success where the male was in his second or third year—but the major portion of our breeding flocks are the pick of two and three year old hens. It has been our unfortunate experience to mate cockerels with pullets, resulting in poor fertility of the eggs and progeny much reduced in size. In breeding from mature stock we are always sure of stronger chicks, and we always know whether or not the color will stay after the molt or leave them at the end of the first year.

Separate the breeders from the rest of the flock. Care should be taken to see that the older hens are not too fat—a very likely condition if they have not been laying heavily during the winter. Fat hens are unreliable breeders and must be fed a light ration until in prime condition. Hard grains scattered into deep litter; to make them work, and very little grain of a heating nature is fed. You receive a larger percentage of fertile eggs from the mating of fifteen to twenty hens with one vigorous male bird.

Too much attention cannot be given the egg and breeding record of each individual in the flock. It is well also to keep at least an approximate record of the feed consumed.

The annual yield, less the cost of production, gives the true basis of determining the valuation of the hens.

Make use of the records, study comparisons, try to be persistent in culling out poor individuals and if you have faith to believe you will succeed.

CLEAN FOOD ESSENTIAL.

One of the most productive causes of intestinal irritation among chicks and hens, is that they are usually compelled to eat their food mixed with droppings and other filth, because the food is thrown to them in places that are insanitary. Fowls of all types ought to have a clean place in which to eat their food, a clean place in which and on which to roost, a clean place in which to lay, uncontaminated air to breathe, and a clean place to litter wherein to do their scratching.

WHEN THE HEN MOULTS.

There is often great neglect of the hen while she is moulting. That's the time she needs your best care. The New Jersey Experiment Station says: "Feathers require considerable fat or oil in their formation; furthermore, the oil in the feed tends to make the new feathers slick and smooth, giving them a bright lustre. Oil meat, Soy bean meal and sunflower seeds are among the best materials to supply this much needed ingredient."

NOTES.

Start the year right by getting the best, either in poultry equipment or eggs for hatching, chicks or stock. The best is always the safest in the long run.

The outlook for a big poultry year is good. Increased sales are reported over last month in breeding stock. An early demand should be made for hatching eggs and day-old chicks.

Early hatching for beginners is proper, provided they have the proper equipment. The early hatched chick is always a profit payer.

It is noticeable this year that the younger breeders are breaking into the wins of the old-timers. Some of the beginners will soon be seen on the top round of the ladder. They are climbing fast.

Many made the mistake this year when feed prices soared in purchasing low-grade feeds, because they were cheap, and underfeeding the same, with less feed value, and by underfeeding the fowls did not produce. To get the best returns from any flock the fowls must be well fed with clean feeds of good food value.

Handle the breeding pen in a different manner than the rest of the flock. Forced egg production is not a good thing from a fertile egg standpoint. Feed the breeders in a safe and sane manner, and not only will fertility be better, but the chicks hatched stronger.

HURT HIS OWN CAUSE.

(Buffalo Express)

On the whole, The Express has more respect for the Bethmann-Hollweg of August 4th than for the Bethmann-Hollweg of this recent "scrap-of-paper" interview. On August 4th he was, at least acting like a bold man. Moreover, he not only showed a clear understanding between right and wrong, but a very creditable regret that his country was committing an injustice. There is neither boldness nor strength in the contradictory explanation offered on January 24th. The spokesman of Germany would be better have omitted this interview. The case of Germany was better even in the light in which he put it on August 4th.

$25.00 FOR A LETTER

CAN YOU WRITE ONE?

Thirteen Prizes to be Awarded in a Letter Writing Competition.

Some years ago the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., of Brockville, Ont., offered a series of prizes to residents of the Province of Ontario for the best letters describing cures wrought by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. Hundreds of letters were submitted in this competition and yet there must have been thousands of other users of the pills who did not avail themselves of the opportunity to win a prize. To all these another letter writing competition is offered. Thousands of cures through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have never been reported. These will furnish the material for the letter to be written in this contest. There is no demand upon the imagination; every letter must deal with facts and facts only.

THE PRIZES.

The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., of Brockville, Ont., will award a prize of $25.00 for the best letter received on or before the 1st day of March, 1915, from residents of Ontario, on the subject, "Why I recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. A prize of $10.00 will be awarded for the second best letter received; a prize of $5.00 for the third best letter, and ten prizes of $2.00 each for the next best ten letters.

THE CONDITIONS.

The cure or benefit from the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills described in the letter may be the writer's own case, or one that has come under his or her personal observations.

More than one cure may be described in the letter, but every statement must be literally and absolutely true.

Every letter must be signed by the full name and correct address of the person sending it. If it describes the cure of some person other than the writer of the letter, also it must be signed by the person whose cure is described as a guarantee of the truth of the statements made.

The writer of each letter must state the name and date of the paper in which he or she saw this announcement.

Fine writing will not win the prize unless you have a good case to describe. The strength of the recommendation and not the style of the letter will be the basis of the award.

It is understood that The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co. shall have the right to publish any letter entered in this contest if they desire to do so whether it wins a prize or not.

The contest will close on March 1st, 1915, and the prizes will be awarded as soon as possible thereafter. Do not delay. If you know of a cure write your letter NOW. Observe the above conditions carefully or your letter may be thrown out.

Address all letters as follows:

RAISINS.

They Are Very Wholesome and Very Nutritious.

The housewife who studies food values has great respect for the raisin.

For she knows that a pound of raisins has a food value as great as three pounds of milk or five pounds of bananas, and they are more easily digested than either milk or bananas. She also knows that they have medicinal qualities and they are excellent blood purifiers.

One of the several good ways to use raisins is in raisin gingerbread. This is the recipe:

Cream 1 scant half-cup of butter or lard with one-half cup of brown sugar, add a pinch of salt and 1 cup of black molasses, [illegible].

To 1 cup of boiling water add 2 teaspoons of soda. Sift 2 1/2 cups of flour and add half of it to the sugar and butter mixture. Then add the water, beating thoroughly [illegible]. Add the rest of the flour and 1 cup of [illegible] raisins.

When all this is thoroughly mixed add remaining half cup of water. Beat two eggs very light, fold into the dough, turn into well-greased dripping pan and bake in a very slow oven for [illegible] minutes.

KETTLE VALLEY

What This Line Means to Transcontinental Traffic.

What the completion of the Kettle Valley Railway will mean to transcontinental traffic, both freight and passenger, was explained by Mr. J. J. Warren, the president of the company, who has been spending a few days east. For years past the Canadian Pacific Railway has been wrestling with the problem of reducing grades in the Rocky Mountain section, and it is probable that it will continue the struggle for years to come. Even in days when expansion work is necessarily restricted and curtailed, orders are given, for example, to push the work on the Rogers Pass tunnel to completion. But with the Kettle Valley Railway and the Kootenay Central Railway in operation the Canadian Pacific will have alternative routes from the main line which should at once make much more economical the handling of trains to the Pacific coast. The Kettle Valley line in southern British Columbia, which links up with railways in the United States, and with the Canadian Pacific, which has running rights over it, will make an admirable alternative route by way of the Crow's Nest Pass, as its grades nowhere exceed 2 per cent., while the Kootenay Central has an average grade of less than 1 per cent. The Kettle Valley line will also be of great value to the fruit growers of the Okanagan Valley, as it touches Penticton and Summerland, and puts them into direct touch with the mining districts of southern British Columbia. As a scenic route the line should prove attractive to tourists, as the southern end of the Okanagan Valley is by far the most picturesque portion of this favored section of British Columbia. By early summer the full passenger service will be in operation, and Mr. Warren expects that a large volume of the transcontinental travel will be diverted to his line.

O'LEARY COW ONLY A YARN

Celebrated Bovine Did Not Start Great Chicago Fire.

Reporter at the Scene Gives Lie to Story.

(Michael Ahern, Veteran Fire Reporter, in Chicago Tribune.)

The story printed in some evening paper that Mrs. O'Leary, owner of the cow that kicked over the lamp which set fire to Chicago, is dead near Menominee, Mich., is slightly erroneous. It is too bad to spoil a good story, but for the sake of history the "error" should be corrected.

Mrs. O'Leary (God rest her soul) has been dead these twenty years past. I was at her funeral. She was the mother of James O'Leary, commonly known as "Big Jim, the stockyards gambling king." I knew the old lady well, and often bought milk of her before the fire.

In respect to her memory I wish to refute the cow and lamp canard. Her cow did not kick over a lamp in the stable where the fire originated.

At the time of the fire I was police reporter for the Morning Republican, which later became the Inter-Ocean. Johnny English was the Tribune's police reporter, and Jim Haynie was on the Times. I am the only police reporter living who helped to cover the greatest fire in the world's history.

It was Jim Haynie, I think, who "faked" the story about the cow kicking over the lamp. No newspaper was printed the morning of Oct. 9, but when the papers were able to get out "extras" the cow and lamp story was given as the cause of the holocaust.

In after years I met O'Leary and we talked about the fire. He told me that in his opinion it was caused by spontaneous combustion of hay. A couple of weeks before the fire O'Leary had put a ton of green hay in the barn loft. It was an unusually warm, dry spell of weather. Everything was parched. The hay, while curing, took fire from the terrific heat that beat upon the roof, and that was what laid Chicago in ashes.

I wrote to the editor of an agricultural paper asking him if hay could catch fire from spontaneous combustion. He answered that it was a scientific fact that fires of this nature, while not common, were infrequently reported.

RUSS ATROCITIES

Cossacks Did Not Even Commandeer Live Stock.

Leaving this central city of Galicia we traveled by special train down the valley of the Dniester to Halicz, the point that formed the extreme Russian left during the battle that extended to Krasne and was followed by the capture of Lemberg. At this quaint little village, which is about as far off the map of Europe foreigners know as any place one could locate, was a fine steel bridge which the Austrians blew up in their hurried flight to the north and west. After their heels came the Russians with their pontoon bridges. In the van guard came three divisions of Cossack cavalry, and behind them divisions and divisions of the Russian infantry itself.

Here was a town filled with Jews and first traversed by Cossacks immediately after having fought an action of many days' duration. This place, one would have imagined, would, if anywhere, show signs of excesses. What we saw was this: A small group of buildings near the station destroyed by fire, and the ruined bridge. Both of these acts, we were told, were done by the retiring Austrians. Perhaps they did them and perhaps the Cossacks did them; in any event, it matters little, for nothing else was touched. In every field were cows, in every back yard pigs, chickens, and innumerable geese, while the fields on both sides of the road traversed by the cavalry were dotted with the stacks of the harvest not yet taken in, but everywhere untouched. In the journey from Lemberg to Halicz the same evidence of restraint on the part of the soldiery was everywhere perfectly clear. A number of the inhabitants were questioned as to the behavior of the troops. They stated that there was no complaint to be made not even of the Cossacks, and that little had been taken, and what was taken had been paid for.

These conversations, for the most part, were in the presence of Russian officers or officials, but the frankness and evident lack of fear of the population led the writer personally to believe that the statements were true.—Stanley Washburn in Collier's.

Germany Will Fight to the Bitter End

Talk About Her Quitting Laughed at By Newly Returned Visitor There

The London Daily Mail has been publishing a series of articles entitled "Germany from the Inside," by a special commissioner, who has just returned from a trip through that country. The concluding article, in which he warns the people of Great Britain not to be misled by hopes of an early abandonment of the war, is well worth a careful reading. The article follows:

What do the Germans really say and think about the war now? is the question which has been levelled at me in England not once but a hundred times since my return from the continent a fortnight ago. "Don't they realize the utter hopelessness of their case? Hasn't the immorality of their actions toward and in Belgium dawned upon them? Isn't this hatred of England we read about more of fiction than fact?" These and a dozen others of kindred sort are subjects on which Englishmen seek light and may I venture to say need light.

German thoughts about the war are as opposed to the British conception of them as the poles themselves. I shall attempt to elucidate these thoughts in the order of the queries above set forth. They have been borne in upon me after contact, aggregating three months of the war, with Germans of every class. I have spoken to the officers, the professors, the business men, the common people and the soldiers themselves. I have read the German newspapers. I have observed the trend of public opinion as reflected from the pulpit, the lecture platform, and the kinema screens. And within the confines of a Daily Mail column I shall attempt to give a composite account of my impressions.

Whether through the blindness that will not see or sheer ignorance—there is a considerable amount of each—the Germans are convinced that they have won, are winning, and will continue to win. When you ask them about Paris or Calais or Warsaw they are ready with replies—a variety of them. Nobody ever said (they tell you) that Paris would be theirs "by Christmas." They did not take it in '70-'71 within five months from France alone. Why should anybody expect them to take the capital as soon as that from France, England and Belgium combined? At any rate, Paris is "within their grasp." They will take it in good time. It is a postponed, not a wrecked, hope. The general staff knows what it is doing. It may be trusted. Paris will soon be starving—that is a very popular German notion. Somehow or other an impression has taken root that the strategy of the German army, though it has not enveloped the city, has already resulted in a sure stoppage of the Parisians' regular food supply. The pinch is becoming tighter from hour to hour. It will soon become intolerable. As for the army, checked on the Aisne, and held on the Yser, it has been led to believe that cholera is raging in Paris and that that is the main reason why the crown prince's hosts have not already marched in triumph through the Champs-Elysees and the Bois.

Warsaw? Was not the Russian invasion adventure in East Prussia (the damage done, by the way, has been fixed by the Prussian diet at more than £10,000,000) magnificently wrecked by the intrepid Hindenburg? Are we not now the masters of Poland? Is not Lodz, the Russian Manchester, in our hands, like Lille, the French Bradford? Is this victory or defeat? you are asked. And how about those 600,000 enemy prisoners in German hands? Do they spell hopelessness for German arms?

Calais? A magnificent base for Von Tirpitz when we get it, but, as events have proved, not at all indispensible to us for attacks on England. Remember Yarmouth, Scarborough and Whitby. We did not need Calais to send the Aboukir, Cressy, Hogue and Formidable to the bottom of the sea. Calais was not the Emden's base, and Von Spee despatched Cradock ten thousand miles from the Channel coast. It is not Calais which enables German submarines to terrorize Britain's grand fleet and bottle up Jellicoe so that he must carry out an impotent and ignominious defensive.

As to Belgium, German public opinion is undoubtedly the last word in moral obliquity. I have seen or read of nothing in human history to equal the callousness with which the average German, man, woman or child—looks upon the crime confessed by Von Bethmann-Hollweg on August 4, and aggravated and multiplied a hundred-fold since then by the burners and pillagers of Louvain, Aerschot, Malines and Termonde. "We gave the Belgian Government twelve hours in which to choose between peaceful acquiescence in our friendly march through the country and national suicide. They made their own bed. Let them lie in it," they say. "They shot our soldiers in the back. They gouged out the eyes and cut off the ears of our heroes. They caused us, a nation which wages war humanely, to resort to tactics which have made the heart of the Kaiser bleed. No, it is we who have been ill-treated in Belgium, not the Belgians. They have richly deserved their fate. They sold themselves to England and France. We have discovered documentary proof that Belgium long ago entered into the plot of the Triple Entente against us."

Reams have been written in England about the Cult of Hate against her, which has become the all-dominating national passion of Germany. Nothing can exaggerate its intensity. Hardly anything can adequately reflect its magnitude. It has become the mainspring of the German fight. The fight with Russia and France is incidental to the greater, the all-important struggle—the overthrow of treacherous Albion. All the agencies at German official command for hypnotizing the country into concentrating its malice as well as its resources on these isles are at work. It would be futile to deny that they have worked efficaciously. The tremendous national unity of Germany is, to a very great extent, the creature and creation of these agencies. But the spirit is there. That is the essential thing. It is manufactured malice, made-to-order spirit, incubated wrath; but these are conditions, not theories, and they are fulfilling their purpose.

I do not agree with a distinguished English war expert who thinks Germany will "cave in" three months after any considerable body of enemy troops has invaded and occupied German territory. He thinks that when the mills and factories of Rhineland-Westphalia are within the enemy's grip, and when the textile and coal industries of Silesia are stilled by the conqueror the death-knell of German resistance will ring. The conquest of the industrial provinces will deal German power to make war a blow almost equivalent to her doom, but I believe implicitly that the Germans are inspired by the spirit of Frederick the Great, as they say they are, and that, like him, they will keep on fighting to the last man and the last mark. Events may prove my view false. But my task has been to base a view on what I have seen and heard. Let us be honest with one another. The Germans have accomplished wonders in the war. The internal organization of her economic forces is a marvel. They have done everything alone, for egg-shell Austria was beaten before she began. I think it fair and reasonable to say that colossal as their losses, humiliating as their military disappointments have been, Germany, if asked to say so to-day, might justifiably retort that she has "only begun to fight."

QUICK HELP FOR STRAINS AND SPRAINS WONDERFUL RELIEF IN ONE HOUR

Rare Herb and Root Extracts in This Liniment Give It Marvelous Power.

RUB ON NERVILINE

You'll be astonished at the rapid pain relieving action of "Nerviline." Its effectiveness is due to its remarkable penetrative power—it strikes deeply, sinks in through the tissues to the trouble.

Nerviline is stronger, many times stronger, than ordinary liniments, and it's not greasy, ill-smelling or disagreeable. Every drop rubs in, bringing comfort and healing wherever applied. You would scarcely believe how it will relieve a sprain, how it takes out lameness, how it soothes and cures a bruise.

Thousands say no liniment is half so useful in the home. That must be so, because Nerviline is a safe remedy; you can use it on even a child with fine results.

Just you keep Nerviline on hand; it's a panacea for the aches, pains and slight ills of the whole family. One bottle will keep the doctor's bill small, and can be depended on to cure rheumatism, neuralgia, lumbago, sciatica, toothache, pleurisy, strains or swelling. Wherever there is a pain rub on Nerviline. It will always cure.

The large size family size bottle is the most economical; trial size, 25c. Sold everywhere by dealers, or direct from the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

STEPHAN BROS.

GLINTZ'S CORNERS

Mrs. James Moore, of Greenock, and Mrs. R. Carlick, of Culross have been visiting at Wm H. McNeill's.

Miss Emma McNeill visited at Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Cunningham's, Walkerton, and was present at a tea given by Mrs. Cunningham for mission purposes.

Mr. Thomas Cunningham, of Walkerton, visited at Mrs. H. McNeill's.

Mr. Neil McNeill took a sleigh-load of twenty young people to Greenock, and spent the evening at R. J. McConkey's. The evening social event was spent in the usual parlor games, incident to such gatherings.

Ned McNeill, (better known as Mac), has been very busy getting his ditching machine in order, preparatory to the forthcoming spring and summer's work. During the long evenings he spends his time with members of the local orchestra in rendering choice musical selections, which are certainly enjoyable to the young people of this vicinity during the long winter nights.

Our old friend, Steve, has started in buying household utensils. He also intends taking a trip to Buffalo. And as, "coming events cast their shadows before", it may safely be inferred that Steve means business.

Amongst the number of farmers in this locality that have litterers installed in their out buildings are; John Scanlon, Hugh and Wm H. McNeill. They all state that this article is a great improvement on old time usage, in labor saving devices in barn yard work.

Hugh McNeill intends enlarging and otherwise improving his residence. He also will improve the lawn for croquet grounds. As his residence is on rising grounds. With these improvements it will give his home a more pleasing landscape appearance.

The ice-cutting business was lively last week.

PINKERTON

Quite a number from the village attended the I.O.O.F. at home in Glamis on Friday evening. After the programme and lunch, dancing occupied the attention of the guests till an early hour.

A number of the young folks attended a dance at Mr. John Fleming's of Chepstow on Thursday evening. All pronounce the dance a splendid success.

Mr. Cecil Garland who was under the weather last week is able to be around again.

A large number of relatives and friends attended the reception on Tuesday evening given by Mr. and Mrs. Samual Reid in honor of the marriage of their daughter, Eleanor Roxena, to Mr. John Clarence Meteer. After the reception, dancing was enjoyed by the young people till an early hour. The many beautiful presents received by the young couple testify to the esteem in which they are held.

A box social and dance in aid of the Belgians, is being held in Pinkerton C.O.F. hall on Friday evening, Feb. 12th. Ladies with boxes free, gentlemen dancers 35c, 20c, to be refunded if a box is bought.

RIVERSDALE

Herbert Petteplace has been prostrated with inflamation of the bowels. His many friends will be pleased to learn that he has nearly recovered from his illness.

Andrew. Friburger is kept busy with his grain chopper.

Mrs. Archie McKinnon was called to Seaforth on account of the serious illness of her mother.

John McPherson of Culross visited his sister, Mrs. W. H. Petteplace.

Fred Klempp had a sawing bee with the old time cross-cut saws. Some of the young men raced with each other in sawing off blocks.

Most of the farmers are busy cutting and hauling the years supply of wood.

The young people spend their evenings in skating and sleigh-riding and dancing parties.

The cawing of the crows was plainly heard for the past few days. Some people say that it is a sign of an early spring.

Court Riversdale, No. 287, C.O.F. held their regular meeting on Saturday evening January 30th. After the usual transaction of business, the installations of officers took place, viz:—

Robert White	C R
John Bannerman	V C R
Wm H Petteplace	F S
James Haliday	Treasurer
Archie McKinnon	R S
John Cassidy	Chaplain
John Symons	S W
John Haynes	J W
Anthony Caskanette	S B
Charles Petteplace	J B
Wm Bannerman	P C R
Dr St Clair	Physician

This court has been organized for twenty five years, and in that time there has been no deaths in the local membership. Having bought the old Lockhart Hall, the members are re-modeling and repairing it for future meetings.

GREENOCK.

On Monday evening, Feb. 8th, a very pleasant evening was spent at John Cunningham's. This event being in honor of his sister and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Moore of Wiarton, who are at present visiting in this locality. Quite a large number were present. The evening was very pleasantly spent by all present in reminiscences of the past. Mrs. Cunningham catered an excellent supper to which ample justice was done. Choice instrumental selections were rendered by members of the family and others.

FORMOSA

On Tuesday of last week, Nicholas, son of Jacob Lehmen was operated on for appendicitis at the Walkerton Hospital and is improving.

The Formosa Mutual Fire Insurance co. will hold their annual meeting next Monday.

It has been pretty cold here but in Milwaukee it was 16 below zero last week.

Miss Florintin Goetz and Miss Annie Brick who have been visiting here for two weeks returned to Preston last Monday.

Miss Millie Weis of Guelph who has been visiting here, left for home last week.

WIARTON DEFEATS BERLIN.

Having defeated the Berlin 1911 championship team, the Wiarton hockey team now enters the finals of the O.H.A. In the first of the home and home games on Friday in Wiarton the Northerners defeated Berlin by 11-5 and the game in Berlin on Monday resulted in a tie 1-1.

The Business College hockey team defeated the High School team on Wednesday last by a score of 4-1.

DID NOT ASSIGN.

Last week we stated that Mr. D. Karges of the East End Bakery had made an assignment. This has turned out to be untrue, Mr. Karges merely having sold his business to the former proprietor Mr. A. Hehn.

EXPECT TO SELL CARS

Leismer & Kalbfleisch who are opening a garage in the building opposite the town hall, and who have the Ford agency for this section inform us that they have already secured many propective buyers and are looking forward to disposing of several cars at least, during the coming spring. Motorists will be pleased to learn that the new firm intend to supply free air to autos at their garage.

HER 8th BIRTHDAY.

Mrs. Jas. Hutton of Brant celebrated her 8th birthday on Wednesday of this week, among the guests at her home being a number of local ladies who drove out and spent the afternoon with her. The aged lady received the best wishes of her friends and among her birthday presents was one from Rev. Thos. Wilson, a large boquet of sweet peas, a flower for every year of her life.

BREAD STILL 12c.

Mr. Jno. O'Malley one of our local bakers informs us that we were in error last week when we stated that the price of bread had been boosted by Walkerton bakers to 14c. per loaf. He stated that the only bread which had been raised in price was Martin's which is retailed at Erdman's restaurant. The local bakers are still selling their bread at 12c. per loaf. We gladly make the correction.

PASSED 85th MILESTONE.

Mr. N. Crawford was the recipient of many tokens of good wishes from his friends on Saturday last, the occasion being the celebration of his 85th birthday. There are few men who have passed the eighty-fifth mile-stone and are still as hale and hearty as our genial collector and court clerk, and the Telescope joins with his innumerable friends in wishing him the privilege of celebrating many more birthdays.

PEACE SUNDAY.

Peace Sunday, observed generally throughout Canada, was made the subject of appropriate sermons in most of the churches on Sunday. The fact that Canada and the United States are now enjoying one hundred years of peace which commenced at the conclusion of the war of 1812-14, was pointed out by several ministers to be all the more commendable owing to the fact that most of the civilized world is now engaged in a titanic struggle.

BUSINESS CHANGE.

Carswell Bros. who have during the past year conducted the general drygoods business formerly conducted by Mr. J. D. Heather, have disposed of their business to Mr. John Weber, who recently moved to Walkerton from Greenock. Mr. Weber took possession on Monday. The new proprietor, besides retailing drygoods also purposes putting in a large stock of groceries, which end of the business will be under the management of Mr. A. S. Royce. The Messrs. Carswell will be in charge of the store until March 1st. and will remain citizens of Walkerton at least for some months after that date.

TOWN HOCKEY

Thursday night was a hockey night at the rink, three games being on the bill. The first game played between the Business College and the team of the Knechtel Factory, the former winning by a score of 3 to 1. The Bobbin Factory and Button teams then took the ice and the former team registered a third consecutive win against their opponents, defeating them 4-1. The opposing teams in the last game of the evening were the Printers team and the Cargill team. After three fifteen-minute periods, which was made necessary by the soft ice, the type-slingers had six goals to their credit as against the visitors four, The Printers play the return game in Cargill to night (Thursday) weather permitting.

WAR TAXES ANNOUNCED.

The principal details of the new war taxes to be imposed by the Dominion Government were announced in the budget speech yesterday afternoon Hon. W. T. White announced the changes to be made, the principal items of which are:—One per cent of Note Circulation of all Banks; One per cent on net premiums of Insurance companies (except Life, Fraternal and Marine); One cent on every telegraph message of fifteen cents; five cents on every five dollar railway ticket to any point in Canada and United States; one cent on all letters and post cards posted in Canada; special stamp taxes on perfumery and wines and other sundries; together with seven and one-half per cent increase in general tariff with the exception of the British Preference.

NOTICE.

All due bills of the Pleskey store are redeemable at par.

CANADIAN IN FRANCE.

The first Canadian Contingent which has been encamped in England for several months is now in France and according to despatches several brigades have been moved to the firing line. Mr. A. Collins received a letter from Dr. Fraser, who is with the first contingent, recently, in which he stated that when the Canadians left for France he would cable "All's well" and this significant message arrived on Wednesday last intimating that Dr. Fraser and all the local men had crossed the channel and were at last on French soil. Local people are anxiously waiting for further word from their friends and relatives in the ranks.

ROUTLEDGE—CONDY

On Feb. 10th, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Condy was the scene of a very quiet but pretty wedding. When their second eldest daughter, Edythe became the bride of John E. Routledge, At twelve o'clock the bride entered the parlour leaning on the arm of her father to the strains of Wyman's Wedding March, played by Miss Alma Hill. The bride who was unattended, looked charming in a dress of white embroidered chiffon voile, and carried a bouquet of bridal roses and maiden-hair fern. After the ceremony all sat down to a dainty repast. The groom's gift to the bride was a handsome fur coat and muff to match. The happy couple left on the morning train for Burlington and Niagara. On their return they will reside on the groom's farm north of Walkerton.

RE-SOLD STORE.

Mr. A. J. Smith who purchased the stock of Mr. J. Pleskey, which was sold by auction in Toronto last week, has re-sold the business to Mrs. C Reaney, daughter of the former proprietor and we are pleased to inform the public that that store will remain under the management of Mr. Pleskey and will open for business on Friday morning. Since making the assignment, Mr. Pleskey has endeavored to secure the stock in his daughter's name but was unable to raise the money until Monday when Messrs. Edward and Chas. Holt of Drayton made a hurried trip to Walkerton and after considerable negotiations, Mrs. Reaney secured the business and placed it under the management of her father. We are pleased to retain Mr. Pleskey as a merchant of Walkerton and wish him success.

SUCCESSFUL ENTERTAINMENT.

The Patriotic Entertainment under the auspices of the Walkerton Branch of the Daughters of the Empire which was held on Friday evening last was a success in every way. Each and every member was greatly enjoyed by the large audience. The play "Woodcock's Little Game" which was put on by members of the St. Thomas church, A.Y.P.A. was the best part of the program and was well put on, the young people who took the leading parts showing exceptional ability. The tableaux were also well staged, the final one, "The British Empire" which depicted the British colonies offering Britannia gifts, being particularly pleasing. The Walkerton orchestra furnished the music during the program and also supplied the music for a dance which was held by the young people after the entertainment. After paying all expenses the I.O.D.E. found they had realized $117, from the evening's proceeds.

AN UNPOPULAR REGISTRAR

W. H. McFarlane, Registrar of Bruce County is being censured by the best thinking people of this county for the dismissal from office of his deputy, Mr. McKay who has been a faithful official in the Registry office for many year. When Mr. McFarlane got the appointment after his defeat in Centre Bruce, he made his home in Paisley and conducted his store as usual in that village, leaving the office work in Walkerton to be carried on by Mr. McKay. After he got settled in Walkerton he engaged a Toronto man and the faithful deputy's services are dispensed with. If civil service reform were in effect Mr. McKay is the man who would have received the appointment. As it is an ungrateful employer dismisses the man who has been giving his best ability for years to the public service. This high-handed work on the part of Registrar McFarlane will be ventilated in the Ontario Legislature.—Chesley Enterprise.

ARRESTED AT TOBERMORY

One of the members of the detachment of the second contingent which is on guard at the wireless station at Tobermory, near Wiarton, P. J. Piper by name, of London was arrested at Tobermory on Wednesday on a charge of fraud and was taken to London, Ont., by a military escort to face the charges against him, there. Piper's arrest followed the disappearance of swords and other military articles which he is alleged to have secured by fradulent means from the homes of London soldiers who have left for the front. He will probably be tried by court martial.

Application To Parliament.

Notice is hereby given that an application will be made by the Corporation of the town of Walkerton to the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario at the next ensuing session thereof for an act to consolidate the outstanding debenture and other indebtedness of the said town at the rate of $41,000, and authorizing and empowering the Corporation to raise by way of loan the said sum of $41,000 on the credit of its debentures to be issued under the authority of the said act.

That the said debentures shall be payable within thirty years after the issue thereof and shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent per annum as the said council shall determine. The existing debenture debt of the said town of Walkerton is as follows: and no portion thereof is in arrears:—

Former consolidated debt	$ 10675 72
Sewers	4907 14
Waterworks	13786 08
General improvement	7310 29
Bonus loans	1686 38
Public Library	1012 10
Floating debt	1821 30
	$41000 00

The reason for requiring the consolidation of the said debenture debt and for the issue of such debentures is to enable a reduction to be made in the sums to be raised annually for the repayment of the said debt and to enable the Corporation to pay off its floating indebtedness, which was incurred in executing works of a permanent and necessary character.

HOCKEY

Walkerton 7 Listowel 3

In the first game of the semi-finals in the Northern League played here on Monday the local team defeated the fast Listowel septette by a score of 7-3.

The game was the best seen on the local ice this season and was a hair-raiser from gong to gong of both periods and the crowd of nearly one thousand people who witnessed the game sure got the worth of their admission fee in exciting thrills.

The Listowel team who came by special train accompanied by about two hundred rooters, were late in arriving and Referee Shea did not start the game until 9 o'clock Right from the face-off the locals carried the rubber into Listowel's territory and for a full ten minutes, literally bombarded their opponents goal, but Donagan who played a stellar game throughout cleared everything that came his way including many that looked like sure counters. Listowel then secured the puck and after some good combination, a long shot from centre striking a defence player's stick and thus fooled LaFrance in the nets. Walkerton soon evened up, but before the end of the period Listowel scored another on a close-in shot making the half-time score 2-1 in the visitors favor.

In the second half the Colts got into the game determined to win and their bulldog tenacity and aggresiveness proved to be too much for their opponents and they soon evened up and then took the lead and maintained it scoring five more. Listowel tried hard to come back but the locals by close checking and hard backchecking broke up everything they started until with but three minutes to play when the visitors scored from a scrimmage in front of the goal making the score 7-3.

The teams lined up:—

WALKERTON		LISTOWEL
LaFrance	goal	Donavan
Taylor	r defence	Hacker
Rife	l "	Aumne
H. Oberle	rover	Kennedy
R. Oberle	centre	Wilson
C. Oberle	r wing	Hay
Runstadtler	l wing	Cavell

The return game is in progress as this paper is being printed (Wednesday night) in Listowel the team having gone to that town by special train accompanied by a large number of fans. The team are confident that they will win the round in which event they are scheduled to play their second semi final game in Harriston on Wednesday of next week and the return game here on the following Friday, the 26th inst.

HAS NOT SOLD OUT.

It has been rumored about town during the past few days that Mr. H. A. Havill has disposed of his tinsmith business. This, Mr. Havill informs us, is incorrect as he has had no negotiations for the sale of his business recently.

IN McMASTER DEBATE.

In a well contested inter-year debate year '15 at McMaster University won the decision last night over the sophomore class, year '17, and thus qualified for the final debate against the juniors, year '16, which will be held in two or three weeks. The resolution of the contest last night was: "That the adoption of commission government would make for more efficient civic administration in the city of Toronto The victorious seniors were represented by Messrs. G. N. Philpott and J. A. Long, who held the affirmative. The Judges were all members of the faculty. Professor Keirstead, Mr. McNairn and Mr. Dawes. The debate took place in Castle Memorial Hall and the speakers were well supported by their respective years, yells playing a prominent part in the programme. The judges decision was greeted in the approved noisy McMaster fashion.—Toronto News. J. A. Long is well known here being a graduate of our high school. He is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Robt. Long of this town.

Some facts for "A Ratepayer Who Wants to Know."

"Although the four residents of Brant had long paid taxes to the township treasurer, they were passed by and when it was moved by Monto and seconded by Willoughby, 'That Mr. Bierworth, who pays taxes in Bentick, be appointed assessor at a salary of $100,' Mr. Findlay said 'agreed', and the Reeve had no alternative but to mark the motion carried."

The above quotation appeared in the Telescope issue of the week before last, and it is the product of the fertile imagination of some member of the Walkerton Contingent who attended the Brant council meeting. How any man who knew anything of the facts of the case, could so wilfully and deliberately misrepresent what really did occur, is past comprehension. But what transpired since is ample proof that this was merely a fore-runner for the charge that was to follow. When the Reeve read the motion of Messrs Monto and Willoughby accepting Bierworth's application, he asked the Council what they were going to do with it, Willoughby replied, "It is necessary for the Mover and Seconder to vote". The Reeve then turned to Mr. Rowand and he gave his assent to the motion. Mr. Nesbitt then asked me if I had anything to say, and I replied "I have not." These facts can be proven by every member of the council. That is the active part I took in the appointment of the Assessor. Though I am charged in the more expressive than elegant language of Mr. Rennie of 'Trying to run the whole works.'

Now for the ratepayer who wants to know, question No. 1. Did Councillor Findlay call to one side one of the four rejected applicants, because the latter owed him fifty dollars, and in order to get square he had to support the Bentick man? Answer. No! decidedly and most emphatically No! I did call Mr. Ormiston to one side and told him that the choice was between him and Mr. Bierworth, and as I had an account against Bierworth which I might be able to collect if he got the job for that reason I was not going to have anything to do with making the appointment. The statement that I was under any promise to Bierworth to support him in return for which I was to receive payment for my claim against him is as false as the heart of the man that makes it. Bierworth never asked me for my support, nor did I ever mention the debt to him. I am sorry only on Mr. Bierworth's account that this matter has become public. I am satisfied that Mr. Bierworth was appointed on his own merits, and on account of the satisfactory and efficient work he has done in the past, and we have every reason to expect he will again "make good." Mr. Rennie's second and third questions do not concern me. The gentlemen at whom they are fired are quite capable of answering for themselves, if they think it worth while. In conclusion let me inform Mr. Frank Rennie that the Brant tp council is elected to look after the interests of the tp. of Brant, and in transferring the tp. account from the bank of Commerce to the Royal bank they felt that they were acting in the interests of the tp. as a whole, When you consider that the Royal bank has branches scattered in and around the tp. as though they had been located for the special benefit of the Brant people their action must commend itself to all reasonable men. Though it seems to have wounded a few who appear to be afflicted with a mild form of what might be termed "Demented Walkertonias. Mr. Rennie among the number.

J. W. Findlay.

TRUE TO HIS RACE

"Yes, my lord, I do. And I have come to-day to take leave of your lordship, and to thank you again, and to say that I shall never cease to thank you for all your kindnesses—much more than kindness to me," said the young man, with much emotion.

"Say no more about it, Benjamin. It is enough that it makes me very happy to be of service to you. But we do not part to-day. I go down to Southampton with you," said the young earl pleasantly.

"My lord! you!" exclaimed Benny, pleasure beaming in his eyes.

"Yes. My little queen in Park Lane goes down to present the colors to your company, and has accepted my escort for herself and her companion, Mrs. Brown. So we will make up a party and take a compartment together. What do you say?"

"I am delighted, my lord."

"I have another motive in going down with you. I wish to introduce you to some of the officers of your regiment, especially to the senior surgeon, Dr. Christopher Kinlock. He is a very good man, indeed And he has a sort of claim upon us. He comes from Scotland, from my mother's neighborhood, from her estate, indeed, being a native of the village of Seton. He was the adopted son and the heir of old Dr. Seton, a distant kinsman or clansman of the Seton-Linlithgows, and so, as I said, has a sort of claim on us. My father procured him a commission in the same regiment you are about to join, and he goes out with it, of course. I think that in him you will find a valuable friend," adds the young earl, very far from dreaming of the important discoveries that would result from the meeting of Ensign Douglas and Dr. Kinlock.

Early the next morning the traveling party of four, namely, Lord Wellrose, Benny, Suzy, and Mrs. Brown, with his lordship's valet and the young lady's maid, met at the railway station and secured a compartment to themselves in a first-class carriage.

The train was the express, and soon steamed down to the seaport upon which the eyes of the world were now fixed, for there were gathered the vast British army about to set sail for the east.

In due time the train reached Southampton.

Lord Wellrose and his party went to a hotel, where they took a handsome suit of apartments, and established the two ladies comfortably.

It was yet early in the afternoon; so after a refreshing toilet and lunch, Lord Wellrose proposed to take Ensign Douglas to the quarters of his regiment to report for duty.

They set out, and in due time reached the quarters of the colonel commanding, where Ensign Douglas was introduced, and where he formally reported.

This ceremony being over, Lord Wellrose took his protege to the quarters of the senior surgeon and introduced him to Dr. Kinlock.

The Scotch surgeon was a man of about forty-five years of age, prematurely bald and gray, but with an erect form, clear eyes and a resolute countenance.

He received Lord Wellrose with much deference, and welcomed the young ensign with kindness.

"Ensign—Douglas, my lord, did you say? Oh, ay, a kinsman of the family, I presume?" said the surgeon, looking from one to the other of his two visitors, and then answering his own question by adding, "Oh, ay, certainly. The likeness shows that, my lord. I never saw twin brothers so much alike in person as your lordship and this young gentleman."

Lord Wellrose did not contradict Dr. Kinlock. He felt that he could not. And then and there the surgeon received an impression that he afterward transferred to all the officers of his regiment—namely, that the new ensign was a near kinsman of the Earl of Wellrose.

It was the hour of the grand parade when the colors were presented.

Lord Wellrose, who presented them "in the name of the fair donor," made a short speech, full of patriotism.

Ensign Douglas, who received them on behalf of his company, also made in reply a short speech, eloquent with deep emotion, in which he said in effect that he was prepared to die in defence of these colors, if necessary; that they should never be taken by the enemy except from his dead hand! Finally, the highest ambition of his life was this—that fate would permit him to plant these colors on the walls of the imperial palace of St. Petersburg!

It was an absurd burst of youthful enthusiasm and extravagance, and yet it was highly applauded.

And so the ceremony of the presentation of the colors ended.

A few days after this the army, consisting in all of thirty thousand men, embarked and set sail for the east.

Lord Wellrose and Suzy, after having taken the most affectionate leave of Benjamin and given and received promises touching a frequent correspondence, returned to London.

Suzy's next business was to give up her little palace in Park Lane, and take lodgings, while waiting for the sailing of the ship that was to carry her to the Antipodes.

It was just three weeks after the sailing of the English forces for the east that Suzy took leave of Lord Wellrose and all her London friends, and, accompanied by her companion, Mrs. Brown, and her maid, Jenny Smith, embarked on board the East Indiaman Wendover bound for Sydney.

Lord Wellrose felt her loss severely, but he was not the sort of man to yield to despondency. He devoted himself to the interests of his great bill for the "Reform of Prison Discipline and the Reclamation of Criminals," and in good works soon recovered his good spirits.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The Earl of Wellrose occupied himself with the humane cause to which he had consecrated his life. And he found in his work an antidote to that depression of spirits consequent upon his separation from his betrothed, and from his protege, whom he had grown to love with more than the love of a brother.

At length Parliament was prorogued and the London season closed.

The Earl of Wellrose, released from official duties, would have gone on a yachting excursion to the Mediterranean, but his mother, the Duchess of Cheviot, made it a point that he should join her autumn party at Seton Court, Scotland.

His married sisters, with their husbands and children, were all to join the party. The Earl and Countess of Ornoch and Lady Hinda Moray were also coming. And the venerable General and Mrs. Chimbosa were expected. But the gathering would not be complete, or at all satisfactory, if her son Wellrose was absent from it.

Now, Lord Wellrose cared very little for blackcock shooting or red deer stalking; but, being social and affectionate, like all his brave and tender race, he cared a great deal for the dear friends and relatives who would be gathered at Seton Court, and he cared a great deal more for his mother's wishes; so he promptly gave up his expedition to the Mediterranean, and placed his yacht, the Arielle, at the disposal of the duchess and her friends, if her grace should please to go to Scotland by sea. He also proposed to keep the Arielle at anchor at the little port of Kilford during the autumn, in the event that the duchess and her visitors should please to diversify their inland amusements by a sea voyage up the wild and picturesque coast of Scotland.

The duchess was delighted with the plan, and thanked her thoughtful and affectionate son, and accepted the offer of his yacht, which was then at Portsmouth, quite ready for sea.

An agreeable family party was immediately made up for the voyage. It consisted of the Duke and Duchess of Cheviot, their son, the Earl of Wellrose, and their sons-in-law and married daughters, as follows: The Viscount and Viscountess Moray, Mr. Albert and Lady Clemence Elphinstone; and their young unmarried daughters, the Ladies Hester and Eva Douglas, and, lastly, their cousins, the Earl and Countess of Ornoch, and Lady Hinda Moray.

There were no others.

"I prefer that for the voyage this should be exclusively a family party. Our visitors will join us at the appropriate time at Seton Court," said the duchess, who ordered all the arrangements.

It was agreed that the whole family party should meet at Cheviot House on the evening of a certain day, and that they should take a special train for Portsmouth the next morning.

Consequently on the evening of the twentieth of August a pleasant circle was assembled in the drawing room of Cheviot House. This circle included all the individuals named for the yachting party; among them, of course, the lovely Lady Hinda Moray—the most beautiful girl in Europe, as all the clubs declared. She was, perhaps, the most beautiful brunette in the world; with a perfect form and perfect features; with a stately little head adorned with a profusion of bright, soft, purple-black ringlets; with large, brilliant, tender, purple-black eyes, arched with slender black eyebrows, and fringed with long black eyelashes, and with a rich complexion deepening into vivid crimson upon the delicate oval cheeks and plump, ripe lips.

All the men in London were in love with her, except the Earl of Wellrose. He had not even seen her for some months.

But now, as he looked upon her this last evening, seated in the drawing-room of Cheviot House, and with her beauty enhanced by a toilet that was perfectly tasteful and becoming, he thought that she was the most beautiful creature he had ever seen in his life, and he wondered why he had never thought so before.

Then he repented, and hoped that he had not, in thinking this, committed treason against his betrothed.

That night, after he had retired to his own apartments, he had found upon his dressing table a letter from Suzy, the first he had received from her since her departure. He seized it with eager joy. It bore two postmarks—"Corvette Revenon" and "Havre."

It had been brought them by a Frenchman homeward bound, that had been spoken to by the Wendover, and it had come by the way of Havre.

The letter disappointed and depressed him by what he considered its coldness and formality.

Suzy had indeed written to her lover in a very matter-of-fact, though friendly sort of way. She dated her letter, "On board the ship Wendover, Atlantic Ocean." And she commenced it with "Dear Lord Wellrose." She told him all the incidents of the voyage; what sort of a man the captain was; who her fellow-passengers were; what kind of weather they had had; what ships they had spoken; what fish and water fowl they had seen; who was seasick, and who were seaworthy. But not one word about her own feelings. She ended her letter by a paragraph written some days later than the first date, in which she told him that they had just spoken the French ship Revenon, homeward bound, and that they would send a boat out to her to take out letters, and bring hers. And she signed herself, "Yours affectionately, Susan Juniper."

"She might as well have sent me a leaf from the ship's log book," said the lover, impatiently, as he refolded the formal little letter, and thought how earnest, fervent, ardent, his letters to her had been.

It was true he remembered that she had not received them yet, and could not receive them until her arrival at Sydney.

And then he went to bed, and fell to dreaming of the brilliant, tender, flashing, melting eyes of the Lady Hinda Moray.

Very early in the morning the yachting party assembled in the breakfast room, already dressed in their traveling suits.

In due time they reached the railway station, where, in a few moments, they found themselves comfortably seated in the capacious double compartment that had been secured for the party.

Lord Wellrose to his complete satisfaction, found himself seated by his beautiful cousin, the Lady Hinda Moray.

And they were all scarcely settled in their places before the train began to move out of the station, and in a few moments, with accelerating speed, to steam swiftly toward Portsmouth.

Lord Wellrose talked with his cousin of the past season in London, with all its trials, triumphs and defeats, artistic, social and political. And he found Lady Hinda as brilliant, witty, and attractive in conversation as she was in person.

He afterward remembered that railway ride to Portsmouth as one of the shortest and pleasantest he had ever enjoyed.

It was but a little past noon when they reached the seaport.

They did not go to a hotel, but took carriages from the station direct to the water side, where the beautiful yacht was waiting to receive them.

It was fitted up with every comfort, convenience and luxury that wealth, taste and skill could command.

As soon as the tide served the yacht sailed.

The voyagers were blessed with beautiful weather, with long, clear, mild days, and with soft, mild, moonlight nights.

It was the evening of the fourth day of the voyage that the yacht ran into the little harbor of Kilford and dropped anchor.

There they found the little steamer Scoto waiting to take them through the straits that connected the harbor of Kilford with the loch.

They steamed up this beautiful loch, and landed at the stairs leading up into Seton Chase.

At the head of the stairs carriages were waiting that took them all up to the house, where the housekeeper, Mrs. Bruce, had all things in readiness for the reception of the family.

The duke and duchess, with all their party, passed through a double line of servants drawn up in the hall to welcome them home.

Then the guests were shown to their apartments.

CHAPTER XXX.

The autumn weeks went swiftly by. The company assembled at Seton Court amused themselves with excursions to celebrated localities in the neighborhood rich in historic interest, and in voyages to the coast isles, rides to the mountain fastnesses, or, nearer home, in archery meetings on the lawn, or billiards in the house.

Not until October did the pleasant circle break up.

And then the Duke and Duchess of Cheviot, with their own immediate family circle, and with the Earl and Countess of Ornoch and the Lady Hinda Moray, left Seton Court for their marine residence at Brunswick terrace, Brighton.

It was here that bad news reached them from the East.

The allied forces at Varna had been attacked by Asiatic cholera, which was making fearful ravages among them.

"Hitherto," wrote Surgeon Kinlock to Lord Wellrose, "Ensign Douglas has escaped the plague; but he devotes himself with unflagging zeal to the suffering soldiers. It is next to impossible but that he must fall a victim to his own labors."

On reading this, the Earl of Wellrose was filled with the most painful anxiety on Benny's account.

He wrote to Benny, imploring him to take care of himself, and not to throw his life away.

He wrote also to Dr. Kinlock, urging him to use every means in his power to prevent the young ensign from sacrificing himself.

And he wrote to the colonel of the regiment, much to the same effect, adding with emphasis:

"He is my kinsman and adopted brother. If he were my own brother, he could not seem nearer or dearer to me; I could not feel a warmer and deeper interest in his life and well-being."

These letters, and especially the one addressed to the colonel, probably saved the life of the devoted young officer, for shortly after their receipt at Varna, Ensign Douglas was detailed to duty that took him far from the possibility of sacrificing his life for the cholera patients.

More news came from the Orient—very important news now. The allied forces had invaded the Crimea, had been met by the Russians on the banks of the Alma, and the great battle had been fought and won, and the allies were in full march for Sebastopol.

A private letter from Surgeon Kinlock to his patron, the Earl of Wellrose, conveyed the additional information that Ensign Douglas had greatly distinguished himself on the field; that he had not only preserved his own colors, but—wounded and bleeding as he was—he had rescued the regimental colors and borne them into the English lines, where he fell, fainting from loss of blood.

He had been very severely wounded, but was now doing well, and in a very fair way of recovery. He had also been recommended for promotion.

How the affectionate and generous heart of the young Earl filled and glowed with pride and pleasure at reading of the gallant conduct of the brave young "kinsman"!

"I knew he would do honor to the name I gave him," he said to himself.

And then he inclosed the surgeon's letter in a letter of his own to Suzy, in Australia, bidding her read the inclosed and see what Benny had already done with his colors, and predicting that he would yet plant them, if not on the walls of St. Petersburg, certainly on those of Sebastopol

Just as he was about to send these letters off to Suzy he received one from her dated on the day of her arrival at Sydney, where her father met her.

The letter was written in a very friendly style, and was filled with descriptions of the town, the country and the people, as far as Suzy had had the opportunity of observing them.

But there was not one word of love from beginning to end, except, perhaps in the rather formal greeting of "Dear Lord Wellrose," and the formal ending, "Affectionately yours."

And Lord Wellrose would have grieved very much over this "cool friendliness" in his betrothed, if it had not been for his lovely cousin Hinda, who comforted him.

After this the news from the Crimea came thick and fast.

Balaklava had been taken, and the cry of the allies was still, "On to Sebastopol!"

Another private letter from Surgeon Kinlock to Lord Wellrose informed his lordship that Ensign Douglas had been promoted to a lieutenancy, and placed upon the staff of his colonel, with whom he was now a deserving favorite.

The next mails from the East brought proud news. The great battle of Inkerman had been fought, and a glorious victory won. And the allied armies had made a splendid march to Sebastopol, and were now before the walls of the city.

Another letter from Dr. Kinlock to Lord Wellrose informed his lordship that Lieutenant Douglas had signally distinguished himself at Inkerman, and had again been recommended for promotion.

And again the generous soul of the young earl rejoiced in the well-doing of his protege. And this letter also was sent off to Suzy in Australia.

In due time—a long time—her answer came back to him.

Gained 30 Lbs. in Few Weeks Never Felt So Well

Was Pale, Weak and Thin, and Had Nervous Headaches Before Using Dr. Chase's Nerve Food.

It is truly wonderful what Dr. Chase's Nerve Food does for women who are weak, weary and run down in health. New, rich blood is what is needed in nearly all such cases, and because Dr. Chase's Nerve Food forms new blood it brings cure — not mere relief, but actual cure—in the great majority of such ailments.

MRS. H. LAICH.

With an abundance of rich, red blood coursing through the veins the nerves are strengthened and vigor and vitality are carried to every organ of the human body.

With the nerves properly nourished headaches and neuralgic pains disappear, appetite improves, digestion is good, you sleep and rest well, and gain in strength and weight.

Mrs. H. Laich, Cannington Manor, Sask., writes:—"You will remember me writing you last spring. Well, I gave up my doctor and began using Dr. Chase's Nerve Food. This treatment cured me rapidly and I was soon myself again. I was pale, thin and weak, suffered from stomach troubles and liver complaint, and frequently had sick, nervous headaches.

"I was surprised to find that in a few weeks' time I had gained 30 pounds in weight. I never felt so strong and well in all my life. Headaches never bother me any more, and I am grateful for the cure. If people would only give this medicine a fair trial they would certainly be cured."

Everywhere people are talking about this great food cure, which cures in Nature's way, by supplying the ingredients to form new blood, and so overcome weakness and disease by an abundance of vitality. Old English and Aliens.

Medieval England had a rough and ready way of insuring the good behavior of aliens. According to the Saxon law of frank pledge, which remained in force until 1370, no hosteler might entertain a foreigner more than a day and a night unless he undertook to answer for his guest's behavior. No foreigners were allowed to keep hostels in London. Some became naturalized in order to qualify for this privilege. Even these were not suffered to compete on equal terms with the natives, being required to keep their houses "in the heart of the city" and being rigidly excluded from the more profitable regions on the banks of the Thames. —London Chronicle.

FREE "PUFFS."

(Toronto News)

Perhaps complaint is ungracious, especially as the Lord loveth a cheerful giver, but there are limits to all things. No one doubts the spirit of a grocer who sells goods for actual coast to a poor family. But no one would ask him to give the goods away and then oblige further with a cash contribution. A newspaper is as much a business as a grocery shop. Truly it is a servant of the community, but there is no reason that it should be an unprofitable servant.

The attitude of editors towards all desirable prospects, patriotic, charitable, religious, municipal, even political, is perhaps too easy. Probably as long as time shall last newspapers will give up their space in a manner which will do more honor to their hearts than to their heads. But honorary secretaries, presidents, general managers should be considerate.

What is going to happen? Mr. Rockefeller, junior, says that "warfare between capital and labor is undesirable, unchristian, and uneconomic, and it should be brought an end to." OUR BIG DEBT.

(Detroit Free Press)

With fifty million dollars already appropriated for war purposes and an immediate necessity for finding another hundred million, our neighbors in Canada are beginning to feel the weight of militarism. The extraordinary demands will almost certainly have to be met by extraordinary measures, since the normal revenue of about $135,000,000 will be required to provide for normal expenditures, which will be lightened only in proportion to the diminution of revenue. More borrowing must be done by Canada and the public debt of the country must be increased.

When this situation arises warnings that went unheeded a few years ago should recur to the minds of our cousins across the line. They have been going into debt impulsively. Although a young people as a confederation, their borrowings mount up to a conspicuous position among the nations, the per capita debt of the dominion being about $50 where the per capital debt of the United States, to take one instance for comparison, is only about $10. With a little more than six million people Canada owes nearly half as much as does the United States with close to a hundred million people.

"I got my foot badly jammed lately. I bathed it well with MINARD'S LINIMENT and it was as well as ever next day.

An Egg Race.

To play this game two empty egg shells and a couple of strips of white tape, each two yards long, are required. There is also a little fan, which is of use in the game.

To play this mark out two goals by pinning down the pieces of tape at opposite sides of the room, leaving plenty of space behind each for a child to crouch down at the outset of the race.

Place an empty eggshell in the centre of each line of tape and choose a boy and a girl to play against each other. Give the girl the fan and place her behind her barrier with directions to fan her egg over her barrier and across her opponents's boundary as quickly as possible. The boy player meantime has to rely on his lungs to make his egg travel, and the player whose egg first crosses the tape of the enemy wins the game.

AN AGE OF SELF.

(Brantford Expositor)

Has the age become so commerical that people are too absorbed in business problems of their own to care to give their time to work for the public weal, or have people become so self-centred that they have little thought or care for anything but their own self-indulgence. Even in the churches, though the auditorium may be crowded on the Sabbath, the members leave the responsibility for the conduct of the various departments of church endeavor to the few, taking but little active interest themselves. The trouble seems to be that in the past age in which we have been living, "self" has become such a dominating factor in people's lives that the inclination to expend either time or energy for anything but personal welfare and pleasure has almost disappeared. This is food for serious thought.

Breaking a Bad Habit.

A customer had come to purchase a beef roast. Now, it seems that Bill used to have a most annoying habit (to the patrons), of bearing down with a heavy hand upon the scales. This high cost of living thing and all that were bad enough in all conscience, thought some of his patrons, but one of them finally broke Bill of this trick.

As was stated, the customer was buying a beef roast, and Bill slyly was helping out the work of the scales with one pudgy fist when before a shopful of people the buyer said:

"Take your hand off that scale, Bill. I'm buying beef, not pork."

Since then no one has had to chide Bill for a similar act.—Exchange.

LEGEND OF THE TEAPOT.

The Chinese claim to be the first users of tea as a drink, and how it originated is told in a pretty little legend that dates from 2,000 years before the coming of Christ.

A daughter of the then reigning sovereign fell in love with a young nobleman whose humble birth excluded him from marrying her. They managed to exchange glances, and he occasionally gathered a few blossoms and had them conveyed to her.

One day in the palace garden the sweethearts met, and the young man endeavored to give her a few flowers, but so keen was the watchfulness of her attendants that all she could grasp was a little twig with green leaves.

On reaching her room she put the twig in water, and toward evening she drank the water in which the twig had been kept, so agreeable was the taste that she even ate the leaves and stalks. Every day afterward she had branches of the tea tree brought to her, which she treated in the same way.

Imitation being the sincerest form of flattery, the ladies of the court tried the experiment and with such pleasing results that the custom spread throughout the kingdom, and the great Chinese tea industry became one of the greatest businesses in the world. —London Tit-Bits.

PREACHER SHOULD GINGER UP.

(Guelph Mercury.)

What is there about going to sleep in church that seems to be so conducive to snoring? It seems to invariably happen that when a person slides off for 40 winks, his head bobs forward and the sound of timber sawing commences. What an inspiration a preacher must gather from half a dozen rich, well developed snores!

GOOD TIMES IN SIGHT.

(Chicago Tribune.)

In industry and trade the improvement has continued. The foreign export figures for January are satisfactory, domestic business is growing in volume; the western railroads are reporting good business; the situation in the south is decidedly better than it was a few weeks ago, as cotton is moving to market and commanding a fairer price; the railroads are becoming more active buyers of rails and equipment; the labor market, while still far from normal, reports decreasing idleness here and there. Some mills and factories have returned to a high, if not full, capacity. Thousands of men have returned to work and more thousands may expect the welcome summons.

Finally, the entire business community, is confidently looking forward not backward. A convention of insurance men from all over the country, recently held in New York, was marked by real optimist and salesmen in every line are reporting similar "psychological conditions." Slight recessions and reactions hardly matter. The general trend is upward and onward.

TIFFS OF THE MARRIED.

(London Advertiser.)

Perhaps after all, these little "tiffs" can be made helpful. With the right kind of a man and woman, and fortunately for the world the majority of men and women are that kind, a little unselfishness, a little tact, will smooth things over and it is a grand training for those occasional big crises that come into the lives of most married people. As somebody has pointed out, a blaring discord in the playing of a symphony brings out in greater relief the beauty of harmony. Instead of leading to separation, legal or otherwise, these differences should lead to better understandings. There should be a giving and taking, mutual concession, if married life is to be the sweet, beautiful condition the unmarried believe it to be. A mixture of common sense and a frank admission of dissimilarities of taste and desires, with a willingness to compromise will help greatly to solve the domestic quarrel problem.

Spanking does not cure children of bed wetting. There is a constitutional cause for this trouble. Mrs. M. Don't blame the child, the chances are it can't help it. This treatment also cures adults and aged people troubled with urine difficulties by day or night.

Meat as a Food.

The value of meat as a food depends chiefly, of course, on its protein and fat, which are valuable in building and repairing the tissues of the system. Yet the government experts report that there is uniformity in the proportion of "building material" in the expensive and inexpensive cuts. The high priced cuts of beef coming from those parts of the animal where there is little motion, have short fibres, making tender meat, while the cheaper cuts have long, coarse fibres, which need long, slow cooking to make them tender enough to be digested easily. This is where the cook shows her skill, for the different cuts need different treatment. —Woman's Home Companion.

COUNTRY BOYS AND ENLISTING.

(Stratford Beacon.)

There is a reason why few young men from the rural districts of Ontario have been enlisting for the service at the front, besides that of not feeling the urgency of the call to the same extent as do the young men in the towns and cities, that is they are not there to enlist, as they were to enlist and did for service against the Fenians in 1866. Another reason is that where there are young men on the farm it is difficult to get help to replace them, in some cases it would be impossible. On some farms there are no young men, on others there may be one and in others more. Where the latter is the case there would not seem to be much excuse. When all feel that the call is imperative they will readily respond.

EDITORIAL

THURSDAY, FEB. 18, 1915

APPEAL TO GERMANS.

The New York Times of a recent date had a remarkable leading editorial on "To the German People, Peace With Freedom." Our namesake has no misgivings as to the outcome of the war. It declares that "Germany is doomed to sure defeat," and that she is bankrupt in statesmanship, over matched in arms, under the moral condemnation of the civilized world, befriended only by the Austrian and the Turk, two backward looking and dying nations, desperately battling against the hosts of three great powers to which help and reinforcement from States now neutral will come should the decision be long deferred. Germany, the Times declares, pours out the blood of her heroic subjects and wastes her diminishing substance in a hopeless struggle that postpones but cannot alter the fatal decree, yet our contemporary believes that the defeat of Germany in this war may become the deliverance of the German people, just as France, by defeat, became delivered from the domination of the Napoleonic dynasty. The Times says that "the terrible misjudgment of the general staff hurled Germany headlong into the pit that incompetent diplomacy had prepared. The Empire went to war with three great nations able to meet her with forces more than double her own." Our New York contemporary gives a most remarkable expression of opinion as to the conduct of the smaller nations. We quote in full:

There is within the German idea an even more sinister portent. The world cannot, will not, let Germany win in this war. With war dominating all Europe peace and security would vanish from the earth. A few months ago the world only dimly comprehended Germany, now it knows her thoroughly. So if England, France and Russia cannot prevail against her, Italy, with her two millions, the sturdy Hollanders, the Swiss, hard men in a fight, the Danes, the Greeks and the men of the Balkans will come to their aid and make sure that the work is finished once for all. For their own peace and safety the nations must demolish the towering structure of militarism in the centre of Europe that has become the world's danger spot, its greatest menace.

The Times asserts that the Germans in Germany do not know the facts, and it appeals to the Germans to cease their attempts to influence American opinion in favor of Germany and turn their attention to convincing their people at home of the futility of the struggle in which they are engaged, and the opportunity the war presents to them of getting rid of the military incubus which presses so heavily upon them. The military rulers of Germany are going to be called to strict account, and the reckoning will be paid by the German people in just the proportion that they make common cause with the blindly arrogant ruling class. When men like Andrew Carnegie and Dr. Eliot insist that there can be no permanent peace until an end has been made of German militarism, sober-minded Germans in the States and in Canada as well as in Germany, ought not to turn a deaf ear to such warnings. The bill of costs mounts frightfully with every month's prolongation of the war, and the toll of human lives is every day growing bigger and bigger. Who will pay the bankers' and the butchers' bills?

But five per cent. is a pretty high figure for a Province like Manitoba to pay.

A former German resident of Winnipeg has a letter in the Koelnische Volkszeitung (People's Newspaper of Cologne), which concludes as follows: "Old no. A Canadian newspaper recently made the philanthropic proposal that on the arrival of every report of German barbarities in Belgium one hundred German-Canadians should be shot. How dearly must the Germans in Canada love a country which treats them like this!" If they believe that, it is no wonder that the Germans sing hymns of hate and hate the British with a consuming hatred.

Dr. Dernburg is said to have delivered an address at St. Paul in which he said:

"The war with Germany is a war against the United States.

"Germany is fighting for increasingly equal opportunity and unrestricted trade, and she is not only fighting her own fight, but the fight of all the neutrals, the United States and the Scandinavian kingdoms as well."

Such a travesty of the truth. Of course this is merely a bid from the doctor for the influence of the United States on the side of Germany. It is a remarkable fact that as the war progresses, and as the spokesmen for Germany keep up their intrigues in the States, public opinion there becomes stronger for Britain and her allies.

◆◆◆

The North German Gazette, published the following in an official communication:

"According to the principles of international law, the United States is, of course, likewise entitled to forbid all contraband trade with all the belligerents by proclaiming a prohibition of the exportation of war material, and all the more so as the trade in war material with England and France has assumed such dimensions as to jeopardize the neutrality not only of the American government, but, indeed, of the American nation."

To do so would be to play into the hands of the Germans. Secretary Bryan has correctly defined the attitude of the United States when he said in his letter to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that the United States market is free to all, and that if the Germans do not share in that market it is not the fault of the States but of the British fleet.

The Buffalo News, commenting on the settlement with the relatives of the dead duck hunter and with his companion, who was wounded, says:

The Canadian government has done the fair thing by the young men who were shot recently in the Niagara river opposite this city, one being killed and the other wounded.

When the parties in interest announce that they have received a sum of money which satisfies them and when also it is announced that the counsel are paid by Canada, so that there is no lessening of the sums paid to the families of those who were shot, everyone else is bound to be satisfied.

Beyond that, the public are certainly gratified that Canada has been so prompt and so just in dealing with this case, instead of holding it as a source of irritation and of friction between the two countries.

A Public Idol

"And so on. You may imagine it, my dear Eustace; I spare you any more of it verbatim. After I had talked away for a long time and brought it all back to the absolute necessity that she should know French and become acquainted with French acting and French dramatic ideals, she pulled me up in the full career of eloquence, by demanding with a little practical air, a twinkle lurking somewhere in her eyes—

"'Explain to me, please; how is it to be done?'

"'Oh,' I said, 'nothing is easier. Do you know anything at all?'

"'Very little. I once had a term's lessons at Kingston.'

"'Very well, then,' I went on, enjoying this little comedy of a neglected education, 'get a French maid, a French master and a novel; I will provide you with "Consuelo" and a translation to-morrow.'

"'As to the French maid,' she answered dubiously, shaking her head, 'I don't know. I expect my old black woman that I brought with me from Jamaica would ill-treat her—perhaps murder her. But the master can be managed and the novel. Will none of you laugh at me if you see me trailing a French grammar about?'

"And so she has actually begun today. She makes a pretense of keeping her novel and a little dictionary and grammar in a bag, and hides them when any one appears. But Paul has already begun to tease her about her new and mysterious occupation, and I foresee that he will presently spend the greater part of his mornings in teaching her. I never saw anybody attract him so much; she is absolutely different from anything he has seen before; and, as he says, the mixture of ignorance and genius in her—yes, genius; don't be startled!—is most stimulating to the imagination."

August 22.

"During the last few days I have not been seeing so much of Miss Bretherton as before. She has been devoting herself to her family, and Paul and I have been doing our pictures. We cannot persuade her to take any very large dose of galleries; it seems to me that her thoughts are set on one subject and one subject only—and while she is in this first stage of intensity, it is not likely that anything else will have a chance.

"It is amusing to study the dissatisfaction of the uncle and aunt with the turn things have taken since they left London. Mr. Worrall has been evidently accustomed to direct his niece's life from top to bottom to choose her plays for her, helped by Mr. Robinson; to advise her as to her fellow-actors, and her behavior in society; and all, of course, with a shrewd eye to the family profit, and as little regard as need be to any fantastical conception of art.

"Now, however, Isabel has asserted herself in several unexpected ways. She has refused altogether to open her autumn season with the play which had been nearly decided on before they left London—a flimsy spectacular performance quite unworthy of her. As soon as possible she will make important changes in the troupe who are to be with her, and at the beginning of September she is coming to stay three weeks with us in Paris, and, in all probability (though the world is to know nothing of it), Perrault of the Conservatoire, who is a great friend of ours, will give her confession of weakness on Isabel's part, and so on. However, in spite of his wrath and the aunt's sullen or tearful disapproval, she has stood firm, and matters are so arranged."

Saturday night, August 25.

"This evening we persuaded her at last to give us some scenes of Juliet. How I wish you could have been here! It was one of those experiences which remain with one as a sort of perpetual witness to the poetry which life holds in it, and may yield up to one at any moment. It was in our little garden; the moon was high above the houses opposite, and the narrow canal running past our side railing into the Grand Canal was a shining streak of silver. The air was balmy and absolutely still; no more perfect setting to Shakespeare or to Juliet could have been imagined. Paul sat at a little table in front of the rest of us; he was to read Romeo and the Nurse in the scenes she had chosen, while in the background were the Worralls and Lucy Bretherton (the little crippled sister), Mr. Wallace, and myself. She did the balcony scene, the morning scene with Romeo, the scene with the nurse after Tybalt's death, and the scene of the philtre. There is an old sundial in the garden, which caught the moonbeams. She leaned her arms upon it, her eyes fixed upon the throbbing moonlit sky, her white brocaded dress glistening here and there in the pale light—a vision of perfect beauty. And when she began her sighing appeal—

"O, Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou Romeo?"—

it seemed to me as if the night—the passionate Italian night—had found its voice—the only voice which fitted it.

"Afterward I tried as much as possible to shake off the impressions peculiar to the scene itself, to think of her under the ordinary conditions of the stage, to judge her purely as an actress. In the love scenes there seemed hardly anything to find fault with. Although I could trace in many places the influence of her constant dramatic talks and exercises with Paul. The flow of passion was continuous and electric, but marked by all the simpleness, all the sweetness, all the young winsome extravagance which belong to Juliet. The great scene with the Nurse had many fine things in it; she had evidently worked hard at it line by line, and that speech of Juliet's with its extraordinary dramatic capabilities—

"Shall I speak ill of him that is my husband?"

was given with admirable variety and suppleness of intonation. The dreary sweetness of her

"Banished! that one word banished!"

still lives with me, and her gestures as she paced restlessly along the little strip of moonlit path. The speech before she takes the potion was the least satisfactory of all; the ghastliness and horror of it are beyond her resources as yet; she could not infuse them with that terrible beauty which Desfontets would have given to every line. But where is the English actress that has yet succeeded in it?

"We were all silent for a minute after her great cry—

"Romeo, Romeo, Romeo! I drink to thee!"

had died upon our ears. And then, a little we applauded her, she came forward listlessly, her beautiful head drooping, and approached Paul like a child that has had [illegible] badly.

"'I can't do it, that [illegible],' she said. 'I can't do it.'

"'It wants more work,' said Paul; 'you'll get it. But the rest was admirable. You must have worked very hard.'

"'So I have,' she said, brightening at the warmth of his praise. 'But Hilderet is wrong, wrong, wrong! When I came once [illegible] to feeling of the Tybalt speech, when I could once hate him for killing Tybalt, in the same breath in which I loved him for being Romeo, all was [illegible] and [illegible] came to me. I learned them, and the thing was done.'

"The reference [illegible] showed that Paul had been reading to her his favorite 'Paradoxe sur le Comedien,' and that she had been stimulated, but not converted, by the famous contention that the actor should be the mere 'cold and tranquil spectator,' the imitator of other men's feelings, while possessing none of his own. [illegible] would have argued, but I would not have made it, and made her rest. She was quite worn out with the effort, and I do not like this excessive fatigue of hers. I often wonder whether the life she is leading is not too exciting for her. This is supposed to be her holiday, and she is really going through more brain work than she has ever done in her life before. Paul is throwing his whole energy into the training of Miss Bretherton, and he is a man of forty-[illegible], with an immense experience, and she a girl of twenty-[illegible], with [illegible] keep him in check.

"Mr. Wallace, who has [illegible] at home across the canal from ours, [illegible] is on the other side, further up toward the railway station, [illegible] not say enough to me of the amazement of the change in her.

"'What have you done to her?' he asked. 'I can hardly recognize the old Miss Bretherton at all. It is not yet four months since your brother and I went to see her in the "White Lady." Why, you have bewitched her!'

"'We have done something,' I said. [illegible] developed in her more [illegible] in her which [illegible] when she first came in contact with the [illegible] and the new ideal which you and Forbes represented to her.'

"How, my dear Eustace, have I given you your due? One of the [illegible] therefore [illegible] many kind things about you! I'll take special pains to tell you some of them next time I write."

Wallace to Kendal.

"Venice, Aug. 27.

"My Dear Kendal: This has been a day of events which, I believe, will interest you as much as they did me. I told Madame de Chateauvieux that I should write to you to-night, and my letter, she [illegible] joined [illegible] from her for a day or two. We have been to Torcello to-day—your sister, M. de Chateauvieux, Miss Bretherton, and I. The expedition itself a good deal of positive teaching. This last arrangement is particularly exasperating to Mr. Worrall. He regards it as sure to be known, a ridiculous self was delightful, but that I have no time to describe. I only want to tell you what happened when we got to Torcello.

"But first, you will, of course, know from your sister's letter—she tells me she writes to you twice a week—how absorbed we have all been in the artistic progress of Miss Bretherton. I myself never saw such a change, such an extraordinary development in any one. How was it that you and I did not see further into her? I see now as I look back upon her old self, that the new self was there in germ. But I think perhaps it may have been the vast disproportion of her celebrity to her performance that blinded her; it was irritation with the public that made us deliver an overhasty verdict on her.

"However that may be, I have been making up my mind for some days past that the embassy on behalf of Elvira which I thrust upon you, and which you so generously undertook, was a blunder on my part which it would be delightful to repair and which no artistic consideration whatever need prevent me from repairing. You cannot think how divine she was in Juliet the other night, imperfect and harsh, of course, here and there, but still a creature to build many and great hopes upon, if ever there was one. She is shaking off trick after trick; your brother-in-law is merciless to them whenever they appear, and she is forever working with a view to his approval, and also I think, from two or three things she has said, with a memory of that distant standard of criticism which she believes to be embodied in you!

"M. de Chateauvieux has devoted himself to her. It is a pretty sight to see them together. Your sister and she, too, are inseparable, and Madame de Chateauvieux's quiet, equable refinement makes a good contrast to Miss Bretherton's mobility. She [illegible] the formation of her friendship of these two people. It was a lucky thought which led you to bring them together.

"Well, we went to Torcello and I watched [illegible] opportunity of getting her alone. [illegible]

"[illegible] 'I feel ashamed of myself [illegible] never had any cause [illegible],' throwing myself down on the grass before her that I might really see her expression, 'if you bear me no grudge, if you feel kindly toward me, will you help me to undo a great mistake I've made?'

"She looked at me with parted lips and eyes which seemed to be trying to find out from my face what I meant. 'Will you,' I said, hurrying on, 'will you take from me "Elvira" and do what you like with it?' And then, do you know what happened? Her lips quivered, and I thought she was on the point of tears, but suddenly the nervousness of each of us seemed to strike the other, and we both laughed, she long and helplessly, as if she could not help herself.

"Presently she looked up, with her eyes ever swimming in tears, and tried to impress on me that I was speaking madly, that I had an ideal for that play she could never promise to reach, that it was my friendship for her that made me change my mind, that there might be practical difficulties now that so many arrangements had been made, and so on. But I would not listen to her. I had it all ready. I had an actor to propose to her for [illegible], and even the costumes in my mind, ready to sketch for her. I meant, were Forbes, I suggested, [illegible] and would direct the setting of the piece; no one could do it with more perfect knowledge or a more exquisite taste, and for her, as we both knew, we would turn [illegible] if necessary. And so I rambled on, scolding her smaller feeling and [illegible] until she had let me beguile her out of her attitude of reluctance and unthinking into one at least of common interest.

"But by the time the others came back I had not got a direct consent out of her, and all the way home she was very silent. I, of course, got anxious, and began to think that my blunder had been irreparable; but, at any rate, I was determined not to let the thing linger on. So that, when the Chateauvieux asked me to stay and sup with them and her, I supped, and afterward in the garden boldly brought it out before them all, and appealed to your sister for help. I knew that both she and her husband were acquainted with what had happened at Oxford, and I supposed that Miss Bretherton would know that they were, so that it was awkward enough. Only that women, when they please, have such tact, such an art of smoothing over and ignoring the rough places in life that [illegible] often with them [illegible]. I cannot tell you how difficult it is. M. de Chateauvieux sounded a long time and told nothing, then he asked me a great many questions about the play, and [illegible] gave an opinion. I was almost in despair, she said so little, until, just as I was going away with Elvira's fate still quite unsettled, she said to me with a smile and a warm pressure of the hand, 'To-morrow come and see me, and I will tell you yes or no!'

"And to-day I have been to see her, and Torcello has brought good luck! Our Elvira, my dear Kendal, will be produced on or about the 20th of November, in the very [illegible] of grace, and Isabel Bretherton will play the heroine. [illegible] already planned in [illegible] and [illegible] with hope and expectation. How I [illegible] you were here! I feel more and more penitent toward you. It was you who gave the impulse of which the results are pleasing, and you ought to be here with us now, playing in the flesh that friendly part which we all yield you so readily in spirit. 'Tell Mr. Kendal,' were almost her last words to me, 'that I cannot [illegible] how much I owe to his influence and his friendship. He first opened my eyes to so many things. He was so kind to me, even when he thought least of me. Have I ever [illegible] win a word of praise from him yet?' There! I trust that will cause a little pleasant warmth in you. She meant it, and it is true. I must go off and work at many things. To-morrow or next day, after some further talk with her, I shall set off homeward, look up Forbes and begin operations. She will be in Venice about three weeks from now, as you know she is going to stay first with your sister in Paris and then we shall have hard work till about the middle of November, when I suppose the play will be produced. This will be more than a fortnight later than she intended to open, and Mr. Worrall will probably be furious over the delay, but she has developed a will of her own lately.

"Au revoir, then. You must have had a peaceful summer with your books and your leisure. I wish I had anything like the same digestion for work that you have; I never saw a man get as much pleasure out of his books as you do. To me, I confess, that work is always work, and idleness a joy!

"However, no more idleness for me for a good while to come. How grand she will be in that last act! Where were my eyes last spring? I wish there were a chance of her seeing much that is interesting in Paris. However, that as September generally is, she will get some Moliere at the Francais, and your sister will take care that she sees the right people. Perrault, I hear, is to give her lessons under the rose. Happy man!"

Kendal read this letter on a glowing August morning as he walked homeward along the side of the pond, where the shade of the fir trees was a welcome protection from the riding heat, and the air was fragrant with the scent of the flag, which was just out in all its first fresh touch of beauty. He threw himself down among it after he had [illegible] the sheets, and stared for long at a sunlit motionless water, his hat drawn forward over his brows. [illegible] this was the outcome of it all. Isabel Bretherton was about to become a great actress! Elvira had found her soul!

It seemed to him, as he lay there curled in the ling, that during the past three weeks he had lived through a whole drama of feeling, a drama which had its beginning, its complications, its climax. While it had been going on he had been only half-conscious of its bearings, half conscious of himself. Wallace's letter had made him sensible of the situation, as it concerned himself, with a decisive sharpness and completeness. There was no possibility of any further self-delusion; the last defences were overcome, the last veil between himself and the pressing force which had overtaken him had fallen, and Kendal, with a shiver of pain, found himself looking straight into the [illegible] face of Love! Oh, was this love [illegible] acute, this dumb craving [illegible] senses of the whole being?

The bees hummed among the heather, [illegible] now and then a little brown-[illegible] lizard rustled faintly beside him; a pair of kingfishers flashed across the pond. But he saw and heard nothing; [illegible] was in the details of the [illegible] about him. His own miserable reverie absorbed him. What [illegible] it then had made the course of [illegible] recently, [illegible] immediately [illegible] staying with her? What was the thing that gave a zest to his work, and each moment to the summer beauty of the country, and, like a hidden harmony dimly responding with him, had kept life tuneful and delightful?

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON VIII.

Feb. 21, 1915.—The Death of Eli and His Sons—I. Samuel 4:1-18.

Commentary.—I. The ark carried into battle (vs. 1-5). 1. The word of Samuel—Samuel had become recognized throughout Israel as a prophet of the Lord. The first sentence of this chapter apparently belongs to the preceding one. Against the Philistines—The Philistines occupied the plains along the Mediterranean Sea in the southwestern part of Canaan and further south toward Egypt. Their name means immigrants, and they may have come from Egypt. From their name is derived the word Palestine. They were thrifty agricultural and commercial people, and were warlike. During the twenty years in which they were oppressing Israel, Samson had been active, carrying on a campaign, single-handed, against them and making them much trouble. Israel had become aroused against them and decided to engage in war in an effort to throw off their yoke. Ebenezer—By anticipation the place was called so, but the name was not given to it until twenty years later. It was situated a few miles from Jerusalem, probably northwest of it. The location is not now known. Aphek—A fortified place. There were many places in Canaan called by that name. It must have been near Ebenezer. 2. Israel was smitten—The Philistines had the advantage in the first conflict. Israel's loss was heavy, being four thousand men.

3. Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us—The elders of Israel acknowledged that the Lord had not been fighting for them. They wondered why, and yet they should have known that it was because they had forsaken the true God. Let us fetch the ark of the covenant.—The ark represented the Philistine army over that of Israel supposed that God would not permit it to be taken from them, hence they believed that, with it in the army, the Philistines might not be allowed to triumph over them. In the battle just fought the superiority of the Philistine army over that of Israel was clearly shown. 4. Sent to Shiloh—The location of Shiloh is placed seventeen miles north of Jerusalem, near the road between that city and Shechem. The tabernacle was there, and it was for many years the religious centre of the nation. Cherubims—"Cherubim."—R. V. The cherubim were winged figures facing each other and standing over the ark of the covenant, probably "as guardians of the covenant." Hophni and Phinehas—Eli was ninety-eight years old, and, being aged, his sons, though wicked, were serving as sons in his stead. They had charge of the ark. 5. Shouted with a great shout—The exultation was not because of the reverence the people of Israel had for God and his laws and ordinances, but because they had strong expectations that they would now be victorious over their enemies. It was to them the same as if their army had been increased by a large number of fighting men. "Had they humbled themselves and prayed devoutly and fervently for success, they would have been heard and saved. Their shouting proved both their vanity and irreligion."—Clarke.

II. The Philistines terrified (vs. 6-9). 6. What meaneth the noise—The Israelites had just been greatly humiliated by their defeat and loss by the Philistines, and they might well wonder why the people of Israel were thus exultant. Hebrews—The name by which the descendants of Jacob or Israel, were called. The word means "beyond," and was first applied to Abraham because he came from beyond the Euphrates. 7. The Philistines were afraid—When they learned that the most sacred object in connection with the worship of the Israelites, even the symbol of the divine presence was in their camp, they were far less confident in their strength than they were before. Woe unto us—The Philistines were troubled because they thought that Jehovah had come into Israel's camp, and they did not know that he had really departed from them. 8. These mighty Gods—The Philistines were polytheists and supposed that the Israelites also served many gods. They knew what had been done for Israel three or four hundred years before this, when they were delivered from Egyptian bondage. It is likely that they had heard how God opened the Jordan for the passage of Israel into Canaan and had given them the city of Jericho in a marvellous manner. 9. Quit yourselves like men—Observe how vividly the successive emotions of the Philistines are painted; astonishment, when they heard the triumphant shout of the vanquished army; dismay, when they learned its cause; manly resolution, when they had recovered from the first panic.

III. Israel defeated (vs. 10, 11). 10. Israel was smitten—Instead of humbling themselves and crying to God for help, the Israelites trusted in the presence of the sacred ark to save them. Their trust was in vain. The courage of the Philistines was that of desperation. Their lives and liberty were in danger. Their enemy was weak with over-confidence. The Philistines were easily victorious. Fled every man into his tent—The thought is that every one who could fled for safety to his own home. The army had been utterly routed. A large proportion of the people of Israel lived in tents. The men of the army made no effort to reunite to oppose the Philistines. 11. The ark of God was taken—So far from the ark's saving Israel, it was itself captured by the Philistines and thus the Israelitish nation and its religion became despised.

IV. The death of Eli (vs. 12-18). 12. Came to Shiloh—The distance may have been twenty miles. A practised runner could cover the distance in three or four hours. Clothes rent—to tear one's clothing was a sign of grief. With earth upon his head—This was also a token of grief. 13. Eli ... watching—Eli was occupying his official seat, which was by the gate of the tabernacle enclosure or by the gate of the city. He was anxious for the ark of the covenant. 14-17. At Eli's request the messenger told him of the terrible defeat of Israel, of the death of Hophni and Phinehas and of the loss of the ark of God. 18. Made mention of the ark of God—Eli had borne the news of Israel's defeat and of the death of his sons, but when he heard that the ark was taken he could not bear it and he died. His heart was set upon the service and honor of Jehovah.

Questions.—Who was Samuel? Where did the Philistines live? What were the relations between the Philistines and the Israelites? Where did the Philistines and the Israelites meet in battle? What was the result of the first engagement? What course did Israel take with the hope of being victorious in the next engagement? What prediction was fulfilled with respect to Eli and his sons?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Disaster in Israel.
I. Resulted from moral apostasy.
II. Gave evidence of the veracity of God.

I. Resulted from moral apostasy—The lesson sets us in the midst of Israel's conflict with the Philistines. Had Israel been faithful to God since the conquest of Canaan, they would not at this time have been vexed and humiliated by the Philistines. Their cry of amazement (v. 3) stands between two defeats. In no way did they admit that the cause of their defeat was their own moral and religious apostasy. The spiritual condition of the people had never sunk lower than at this time. The peril of Israel lay as much in the unworthiness of their leaders as in the vices of the people. The character of the priesthood had become thoroughly corrupt. The people had changed their religion into a formal superstition. The neglect of family discipline, the daring disobedience of children in the priestly family and the disregard of the commandments of God among the people brought the nation to its day of judgment. Heedless of repentance and reformation Israel sought freedom and prosperity by the exertion of their own physical powers. Conformity to the will of God was despised. Israel sought the ark of the Lord and trusted in it with superstitious veneration. It was a superstitious and irreverent use of the symbol of God's presence. This revealed the heathenish feature in the religious life of Israel and showed that their faith was obscured by superstition. Eli was the theocratic judge of the Hebrew commonwealth. His administration centred around Shiloh where Eli dwelt and where the ark was kept and its statutes observed. But Israel called for Hophni and Phinehas, the sons of Eli. These men who were rapacious, licentious and blasphemous, in common with Israel, did not reflect that the ark dissociated from the living God became a desecrated thing and that, if they so acted as to forfeit the real presence of God, the ark was powerless to lead them on to victory. They were destined to learn the peril of irreverence, superstition and vain confidence.

II. Gave evidence of the veracity of God. Defeat came to Israel despite the presence of priests and boastful parade. There was a shout in the camp of Israel at the arrival of the ark. The sight of the sacred symbol made them boastful and confident. The Philistines fell into an error of a different kind, for they were frightened without any real cause. They mistook the visible for the invisible. The acquaintance of the heathen nations with the wonderful demonstrations of the power of the God of Israel in the many deliverances which he had wrought in their behalf was widespread. When Israel again faced the Philistines they mistook enthusiasm for faith. They valued novelty above the divine order. Israel met defeat because of years of disobedience, and were bereft of the divine presence and help. The whole nation, which had forsaken their God, was deprived of the sign of his presence. It was a most crushing catastrophe when the ark was taken and set up before the heathen god Dagon. Israel's exultation was therefore speedily turned into humiliation and the fear of their enemies into triumph, though that event was not an assurance to the Philistines that God was not able to maintain the dignity of his own ark, for without any army he forced them to send it back to Israel. It was an evil day for Hophni and Phinehas when they took the ark of the covenant from Shiloh and sought to work on the fanaticism of the people. They provoked the judgment which shed their blood. It was no accident which sent them together to the death. It was a proof of the faithfulness of God to his word. It was a warning to transgressing Israel. They were made conscious of His power though the symbol of his presence was carried away by the hand of his enemies. Greater than the ark of the Lord was the Lord of the ark. Eli saw the affairs of the Jewish commonwealth brought to their lowest ebb. It was as a parent chiefly that he revealed his weakness, and in this character he was especially judged. The omission of parental restraint was ruinous to parent, children and the nation.

Don't Allow Your Bowels To Become Constipated.
If the truth was only known you would find that over one half of the ills of life are caused by allowing the bowels to get into a constipated condition.
When the bowels become constipated the stomach gets out of order, the liver does not work properly, and then follows the violent sick headaches, the sourness of the stomach, belching of wind, heartburn, water brash, biliousness, and a general feeling that you do not care to do anything.
Keep your bowels regular by using Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. They will clear away all the effete matter which collects in the system and make you think that "life is worth living."
Mrs. Hans. McKitrick, Wakefield, Que., writes: "For several years I was troubled with sour stomach and biliousness and did not get relief until I used Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. I had only taken them two weeks when my trouble was quite gone, and I will recommend them to all suffering as I did."
Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c per vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all drug stores or dealers, or will be mailed on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Vegetable Acids and Where Found.

1. Acetic acid is found in wine and vinegar.
2. Tartaric, found in grapes, pineapples and tamarinds.
3. Malic (much like tartaric), found in apples, pears, peaches, apricots, gooseberries and currants.
4. Citric found in lemons, oranges, limes and citron.
5. Oxalic, found in rhubarb and sorrel.

Fruit acid is obtained from all [illegible] fruits [illegible] contain two or more acids. Malic and citric are found in strawberries, raspberries and cherries. Malic, citric and oxalic in cranberries.

"It's a good plan to do one thing at a time," admonished the Wise Guy. "Yes, provided it's the right thing and the right time," added the Simple Mug.

Roof Garden Paint Tests

These tests have proven that this paint wears longer than ordinary paints—and that it leaves the surface in better condition for repainting when that becomes necessary.

On houses—it has been found to wear years longer than ordinary paint—think what this saves when your painting cost is figured per years of wear.

WOMAN'S BEST MEDICINE

Mrs. Kelly Advises all Women to Take "Fruit-a-Tives"

HAGERSVILLE, ONT., AUG. 26th 1913.

"I can highly recommend "Fruit-a-tives" because they did me an awful lot of good and I cannot speak too highly about them. About four years ago, I commenced taking "Fruit-a-tives" for a general breakdown and they did me a world of good. We bought a good many dollar's worth, but it was money well spent because they did all that you claim for them. Their action is so pleasant, compared with other laxatives, that I found only pleasure, as well as health, in taking them. They seemed to me to be particularly suited to women, on account of their mild and gentle action, and I trust that some other women may start taking "Fruit-a-tives" after reading my letter and if they do, I am satisfied the results will be the same as in my own."

W. N. KELLY

"Fruit-a-tives" are sold by all dealers at 50c. a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c, or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

The History of the County of Bruce

And of The

Minor Municipalities Therein

(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)

Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps, Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

OFFICERS DISCARD SWORDS.

Officers of the first Canadian contingent will discard their swords and other equipment by which the Germans could distinguish them from privates. In addition the officers will also carry rifles in an effort further to do away with the distinction between the officers and men.

Mr. Alf Schnurr of Walkerton spent a few days of this week with Mildmay and Carrick friends. While driving out into the country last Saturday with Jos. Kunkel's livery horse, the animal fell and broke the shaft of the cutter and we learn that Mr. Schnurr had considerable difficulty in reaching his destination. He hit upon the ingenious plan however, of attaching his crutch to the broken shaft and in this manner he managed to complete his journey without further mishap.—Gazette.

C. E. START FOR JUNIOR JUDGE

For junior judge of Bruce County the choice should go to North Bruce. Three former Walkerton lawyers, Klein, Barrett, and Scott received appointments as judges. That's not coming to badly for the legal lights of the county town. It is now North Bruce's turn for an appointment to the bench and as the honor will go to a Conservative we have no doubt C. E. Start of Tara will get the office. He is a staunch worker for the party in power; has had a long legal training; and would adorn the bench with honor to himself and his county. The patronage lies with Col. Hugh Clark M. P. and he will, we expect recommend Mr Start for the vacancy after the senior judgeship goes to Judge Klein. We hope to write it, His Honor's Judge Start before long.

Sir John French, who recently inspected the 1st Batt. East Surrey Regt. of which Mr. J. Giffin, of Walkerton, is a member, addressed the Battalion as follows:—I am very glad to have the opportunity of addressing you to-day and of thanking you for the work you have done, on the way here I asked your corps commander what special occasion I could mention in which you have distinguished yourselves. Whatever you mention and whatever you say to them, he said, will not be too much they have been splendid throughout no regiment could wish for higher praise than this and I thank you personally for what you have done and the way you have helped me. The 5th division have had more than their share of the fighting in this campaign. On the terrible retirement after Mons and Le Cateau, you had the brunt of the fighting and immediately after at the battle of the Mons you had to attack the most difficult section of the line and the attack was brilliantly carried out. Not a week later you were engaged on the Aisne and held the extremely difficult position of the Missy, into which a incessant rifle and shell fire was poured from the commanding German position above. Less than a month after this the regiment was in the thick of the terribly severe fighting around La Basse where you were [illegible] by thrice if not four times your numbers and experienced some of the fiercest fighting of the War. Lately in the trench fighting you have gallantly defended your lines against the most determined attacks and the most vigorous shelling. In fact you have crowded into the six months of this campaign enough fighting to fill the Battle Honours of any Corps and by your conduct throughout you have not only upheld but greatly added to the fame of a grand old regiment and to [illegible] [illegible] Chief. I wish once more to thank you for your endurance and the splendid work you have performed and to tell you how pleased I am to have had this opportunity of [illegible] to tell you so.

104,000 BRITISH KILLED.

Premier Asquith, speaking in the House of Commons on Monday, said that British casualties in all ranks in the western arena of the war, from the beginning of hostilities to February 4, amounted approximately to 104,000 men. This includes killed, wounded and missing. This number almost approximates the effective strength of the First Expeditionary Army.

Port Elgin has a ward in the Bruce county hospital at Walkerton, but from the number of people at Guelph it would seem that a ward is needed in that hospital. This week the Times has a report from the hospital that all Port Elgin residents confined there are doing well. Miss Della Collard is improving, Miss Sadie Cameron underwent a successful operation, Miss Nellie George is on the way to permanent recovery, and Mrs Thos. Hendry who underwent a serious operation is also reported as recovering nicely.—Port Elgin Times.

There is undoubtedly a slowness in recruiting from the rural districts of Ontario, but lack of loyalty can hardly be ascribed as the reason. Rural Ontario has been depleted of her young men who have gone in great numbers to the cities and the Canadian West, some to the United States. What we have and more, are needed to cultivate the land and fulfil that other patriotic obligation that is being urged upon the farming community to produce more foodstuffs that our armies may be fed and our people sustained without having to pay famine prices.—Mt. Forest Confederate.

HYMN WRITER DEAD.

Fanny Crosby, blind and a famous hymns writer, died at her home in Bridgeport, Conn. on Friday, at the age of 95. Fanny Crosby contributed more than eight thousand hymns to the Protestant church. She signed her work by over two hundred pen names because her publishers wished to make it appear as though there were other writers in the field. Her hymns were printed in practically every language. She had been blind from infancy. She was not able to read by raised letter, getting her knowledge through her remarkable memory. "Jesus Keep Me Near The Cross," "Saved by Grace," "Blessed Assurance" "Rescue the Perishing" and "Safe in the arms of Jesus" are some of the best known of her hymns.

PATRIOTISM AND PRODUCTION

Complete Your Plans Now

The important thing now is to consider the [illegible] [illegible] of the year's work—for increased production. By planning well [illegible] [illegible] operations can be carried through more effectively when the time comes. [illegible] [illegible], through neglect of this, will mean loss to you and to the Empire.

Use the Best Seed

[illegible] year, for the sake of the Empire, farmers should be exceptionally careful in the selection of seed. Cheap seed is often the dearest. If every Canadian farmer would use only the best varieties, and sow on properly [illegible] soil, the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] would only with reliable seedsmen. Write at once to Canadian Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, and to your Provincial Agricultural Department for information as to the best varieties of seed to be used in your particular locality, and use no others.

Clean Your Seed

All grain intended for seed should be thoroughly cleaned and [illegible] to retain only the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] When you have your seed [illegible] ready, put it through the cleaner once more.

Test Your Seed

[illegible] seed for vitality, [illegible] not always as [illegible] looks. For example, [illegible] normal in appearance [illegible] may be badly [illegible] by frost that their [illegible] seed is completely [illegible]. If you have any [illegible] as to the quality of your [illegible] sample may be sent free [illegible] laboratory, Ottawa, [illegible] for [illegible]. But in [illegible] this simple test will [illegible] sufficient: [illegible] a saucer and two pieces [illegible] paper. Place seed between blotting papers. Keep moist and in a warm place. In a few days you will be able to see whether the vitality is there. [illegible] to test your seed may mean loss of crop.

The Farm Labour Problem

The Government suggests the forming of an active committee in every town and city, composed of town and country men and women. This committee would find out the sort of help the farmers of their locality need, and get a list of the unemployed in their town or city, who are suitable for farm labour. With this information, the committee would be in a good position to get the right man for the right place.

Councils, both rural and urban, Boards of Trade and other organizations could [illegible] [illegible] such work. Every unemployed man in the town or city who is placed on the farm becomes immediately a producer, instead of a mere consumer and a civic expense.

Increase Your Live Stock

[illegible] [illegible] Canada's most valuable [illegible] [illegible] future of the world's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] great shortage of [illegible] [illegible] your breeding stock. Some Aids to Health

WEARING GLASSES.

Why do we wear glasses? To see better, of course. Is that all?

By no means. Glasses were first used to help defective sight.

Up to about a generation ago they were used for that and that only. Then it was discovered, and little by little the knowledge is spreading, that there are many whose eyesight is not at all impaired, who can see perhaps 25 per cent. to 50 per cent. better than normal, and yet who are suffering from eye strain in some of its myriad forms.

It was found that, by wearing suitable glasses, the eye-strain could be relieved and headache, dyspepsia, irritability, nervous fatigue and other like symptoms could be cured when due to that cause, or even when due partly to that and partly to other causes.

The majority of such eyes are far sighted. They are too short, so that objects are not focussed on the retina as they must be to see distinctly.

Now there is a muscle and nerve in the eye, called the ciliary muscle and nerve, which is for the purpose of changing the focus of the eye as needed. With the aid of these, farsightedness is corrected.

This is why such eyes see so well. But it is also the reason why they cause so much trouble.

Every minute the eyes are open they are compelled to make this adjustment, because we are not satisfied to see indistinctly when we can, by an automatic adjustment, see perfectly.

This is exacting work and a great strain on the nervous system.

In many cases, the strain is not felt in the eyes so much as in the head, neck, stomach or "all over."

Since many are tired and run down, and when rested and reinvigorated are able to resume the focusing without much headache, etc., it is not surprising that many physicians, as well as many of the laity, overlook the eyes as the important factor, and advise rest or tonics or other treatment, often with very good temporary results.

The wise treatment is to remove the cause and take such rest and other remedies in addition as may be needed to undo the damage.

The deadly germ, breeder of typhoid, tuberculosis and many other diseases, hates the sunlight. It simply refuses to live in dry air and it fades away just as soon as its surroundings become clean, and bright and dry.

Why not barricade your body against a germ-invasion with sun, good air and cleanliness?

THE EYES.

Upon the public school teacher rests much of the burden of improving the condition of juvenile eyesight and of reducing the frightful and constantly swelling statistics of those who walk "eternally in darkness."

The school teacher has control over the child when he is more often exposed to conditions which cause eye trouble and which lead to failing sight!

The light in which the child studies—his contact with children who have communicable eye disorders—the every day test of his visual powers in the daily blackboard lesson.

Impress school teachers with the vital importance of warning the parents especially those parents who are apt to overlook warnings until too late!

Upon the school teacher depends much and in some cities school boards have taken up this educational work with a determination to get results. But many other cities neglect it.

No teacher should complain of this work, for she is the one who is the most benefitted by it. One child who, through some uncorrected eye, ear, nose or throat defect, continually lags behind his class and becomes idle, mischievous and disturbing will cause the teacher more trouble in the course of a year than would the making of these tests.

They are really labor and nerve-saving devices, and the teachers ought to recognize this fact and encourage them. This has been the case where the tests have been systematically carried out.

Every child found defective should be handed a "Card of Warning" to be given to the parents, notifying the parent that a defect has been found and urging that the child be taken to a doctor of the parent's choosing, either at his office or free dispensary.

If no attention is paid to these cards, the matter should be persistently and tactfully followed up, either by the teacher or the school nurse, or by both.

In this way many dull and backward children will become bright and pliable scholars, their health will be improved, the community will be benefited, both socially, morally and financially, and, lastly, the teacher's work will be immeasurably easier and pleasanter.

The annual, systematic, preliminary examination of school children's eyes, ears, noses and throats by school teachers is an agency of enormous and incalculable benefit to the children, to the parents, to the teachers and to the community at large.

Then why not universally benefit by it, especially as the cost is insignificant? The only expenses are the testing charts, "Warning Cards" and the simple record blanks which cost almost nothing.

If medical inspectors had to be hired to do this work, the lack of funds might prove an embarrassment. But medical inspectors are not necessary, as the teachers can do it perfectly well, and by answering the nine simple questions at least 95 per cent of serious eye, ear, nose and throat diseases will be detected.

THE BABY.

Upon its treatment in the early stages of its development will depend the growth of your child into a healthy and sound man or woman.

Much attention has been given in recent years to the prolongation of human life by beginning at the period of life as well as in safeguarding the machinery of the body in after years.

A good start is important.

And to mother's instinct, valuable as it may be, may be added profitably the accumulated knowledge of men and women who have devoted their lives to the study of health rules for the nursery.

Do you punish your child? Are you severe?

A common error made by young mothers is the tendency to be severe with the growing child.

Such a practice is more than likely to make the child grow up of sullen, suspicious disposition. A young child knows nothing of right or wrong and early training is designed to help him tell the good from the bad. But punishment is not the shortest nor the most effective route.

Example counts for much. Keep your temper with a child. Do the things you would have him do—he'll imitate you.

Be kind, gentle and patient. Don't scold continually. Sternness may be often necessary, but not the sternness that intimates and instills dread.

Cowards are often bred before their third year and character certainly begins its constructive period in babyhood.

Beware of the careless nurse girl. She has almost unlimited opportunities for harming the baby.

One has only to visit the parks of any city on a pleasant day to note the neglect and misdoings of nurse-girls. Infants are allowed to lie with the sun shining in their eyes; are permitted to become chilled and hungry.

They are scolded or jerked about by one arm or fed with candy and cakes to keep them contented.

When at home they are left strapped in a high chair for long periods, or without the mother's knowledge are dosed with opium or morphine in the form of "soothing syrups" to quiet them.

Give the growing child plenty of water to drink—he needs it—and it's better for him than tea.

But teach him not to drink everywhere and anywhere, many diseases are transmitted through water. Don't let him drink ice water with meals.

WEARING GLASSES.

The eye is a living thing, very much alive and active.

There is nothing more characteristic of living things than change. It is not to be wondered at that results obtained one day may not exactly tally with those found the next day, particularly in eyes that are irritated by strain, overuse, ill health, etc.

This it is impossible to set a definite time and say all eyes should be examined every six months or twelve months, or any other period that will fit all cases.

Some disorders must come in a few days, others a few months, others a few years.

One of the most troublesome optical effects produced by glasses is the feeling as if the floor were rising and you were walking uphill, and as if you had grown much shorter; or, conversely, as if the floor were sloping away and you had grown taller.

These and similar effects may be very annoying and may even cause dizziness and nausea. They are due to an optical distortion produced by certain glasses.

Usually the feeling soon passes off. It is unwise to wear such glasses at once in a crowded street, especially in a strange city. One should get used to them at home before venturing where a misstep might cause a serious accident.

In getting used to glasses, it should be borne in mind that glasses are often ordered to make the eyes do their seeing in a different way. If glasses were given, as they easily could be, which did not make the eyes see differently, they would cause no trouble in getting used to them, but, of course, they would do no good if what was really needed was something to make the eyes change from a bad way of using them to a new and better way.

When Willie is cross and won't "mind mother," when he's dull and won't study his lessons, don't take down the birchrod and don't call him a naughty boy. It's quite likely that Willie has adenoids.

If he breathes through his mouth instead of his nose, if his voice is expressionless and his face dull, if his upper teeth are prominent look for adenoids—and have them removed.

TUBERCULOSIS.

Medical science has laid down certain fundamental rules for the guidance of people who are inclined to tuberculosis endeavoring to improve their prospects by proper living. These rules are largely the result of actual experience. Now and then investigation eliminates many from consideration but others remain. Here are a few "boiled down" practical hints for those exposed or inclined to the disease seeking the light:

You must have pure air to breathe, night and day. Stay out of doors all the time in all kinds of weather. If you cannot be out of doors, keep the windows open. Avoid direct drafts, but be in a room where there is a free circulation of air.

Opening on two or more sides of the room are better than openings on one side. That is, have a cross circulation of air. Pure air enriches the blood, lessens the accumulation of poisons and invigorates the body.

Keep the head protected from the sun.

Second, you must have nutritious food.

Three good meals a day are necessary. Eat plenty of cereals, like oatmeal and rice, bread, butter, meat at least once a day, milk and cream. Supplement by use of eggs, if stomach is weak and meals do not agree. Milk is especially good to form fat.

Fruit is usually agreeable but should not take the place of nutritious foods if stomach is sensitive. Do not use alcohol.

Third, rest. Complete rest in bed is absolutely necessary all the time if temperature rises about 100 degrees by mouth at any time during the day.

If you think you need a tonic change your food—add something fresh and green, such as vegetables or fruit to your daily diet. They are cheaper than bottles of medicine and a great deal safer, unless the medicine has been prescribed by a physician.

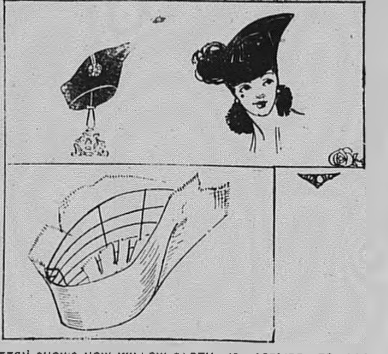
LIGHT-WEIGHT HAT FRAME WILL END THOSE "SHOPPING HEADACHES"

Clarissa Chesley's Second Millinery Lesson Tells How to Substitute Willow Cloth Frame for Wire.



SKETCH SHOWS HOW WILLOW CLOTH IS APPLIED TO WIRE FRAME, AND ALSO INDICATES HOW CLOTH IS SLASHED AT HEAD SIZE.

(By Clarissa Chesley.)

That "shopping headache," which so much annoys many women, is frequently the result of too heavy a hat.

Once having tried the light willow cloth frame, described in this article, the home milliner will never again want to wear a hat with a wire frame.

Before beginning to cover the wire frame described in the last article, dampen a sheet of willow cloth very thoroughly.

Place the sheet of cloth around the out-side of the wire frame with the straight edge of the cloth at the centre front. Pin it to the last wire at the edge of the brim, bringing it down under the crown and letting it extend up inside as far as the wires go.

Take a needle and thread and whip it with long stitches at the brim edge where you have pinned it, so as to make it accurate. Remove the pins. Then sew it the same way on the inside of the hat to the crown wires.

With a lead pencil mark the cloth at the edge of the brim on the inside even with the wire edge and cut at the pencil mark.

The hat is then ready to dry. This can be done over artificial heat or if you have the time it can dry over night. When it is dry clip the threads at the brim edge and in the crown and remove the wire mould.

The next step is to wire the edge by whipping the wire to it with an over and over stitch. The raw wired edge is then bound with a narrow strip of thin crinoline, and sewed through and through with long stitches.

The head size is wired also and two wires run up the brim at the points where it is dented in. The material is slashed at the head size as shown in the cut, to make it fit. The frame is then ready to cover with the velvet which is both basted and sewed on, instructions as this will be given in the next lesson.

Royal Family of Roumania

King Ferdinand

The new King of Roumania couldn't very well have come to the throne at a more difficult time. If Roumania contrives to keep clear of the war it will be by something like a miracle, as you will see if you look at your map of Europe.

For Roumania has as neighbors Russia on the east, Austria and Servia on the west, and Bulgaria on the south, with Turkey not so very far away.

Roumania is a country that has always had to fight for existence, partly because until within the last century the throne did not necessarily pass to the eldest son of a king. All sons were eligible, and the country had the right to choose its king from amongst them.

As a result the people quarreled amongst themselves as to which particular son should be placed upon the throne, and very often neighboring kingdoms were asked to take a hand in the struggle.

Sometimes they interfered a little too much and tried to annex land for themselves, which meant more fighting.

But though the Roumanian can, and does fight stubbornly, if he feels it his duty, he much prefers a peaceful life.

And he hates the time that he has to spend in barracks preparing to do his duty to his country should need arise.

He pines for the home he has had to leave behind, and fears that harm may come to his dear ones during his absence.

Most peasants build their own cottages—sometimes before, but more often after they get married.

Till the new home is ready, the couple live with the man's parents.

The Roumanians are no good at gardening, though they make excellent farmers. The market gardens that supply the towns belong almost entirely to Bulgarians who have settled in the country.

In the country districts maize and haricot beans are the staple food.

And the average Roumanian isn't a bit thrifty. Perhaps that is not to be wondered at, when one remembers that it is only the present generation that has known what it is to live without fear of being plundered.

When there was a possibility that they might be invaded at any moment by neighboring states, there was no object in saving, for the enemy were sure to take whatever had been put by.

One scarcely ever sees a fat woman in Roumania. They are generally thin and delicate looking, with small hands and feet, and nearly all are comely and pleasant, while many are very beautiful.

The new King and Queen own what are probably the simplest symbols of monarchy belonging to any civilized kingdom. For the Queen's crown is a plain little circlet of gold, while the King's is of iron, having been made by order of the late King from part of the metal of a Turkish gun taken at Plevna.

To be a popular King in a country like Roumania one must first of all be democratic, and this the present Royal family certainly are.

The Queen-Dowager, Carmen Sylva, lived the simplest of lives, and took a tremendous interest in the people, more especially in the blind, of whom there are an unusual number in Roumania.

There was very little state about the Court during her husband's reign. Everything was as simple as possible and the whole atmosphere exactly like that of an ordinary country house.

The present Queen is, of course, a British princess. Her father, the late Duke of Edinburgh (afterwards Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha), was the second son of Queen Victoria, and Princess Marie, as she then was, was only seventeen when Prince Ferdinand came a-wooing.

A good many English folk disapproved strongly of the idea of such a "mere child" being allowed to wed. Even Queen Victoria, it is said, protested, but the Duke answered all protests by saying, "She will marry the man I choose now; later on she might expect to choose for herself."

High up in the Carpathian Mountains, Queen Marie has a beautiful highland home at Sinai, and she is never so happy as when entertaining her friends there.

All sorts of outdoor sports are the order of the day, and in the house the Queen nearly always appears dressed in the quaint national costume that so well becomes her. This has naturally enough caused a great revival in peasant industries.

The national dress is probably more worn in Roumania than in any other country in the world. Even many of the quite poor peasants possess most beautifully embroidered handworked robes, which have been handed down as heirlooms, and are worn on special occasions.

The Queen's rooms, too, in this mountain home are furnished to match her clothes.

In her boudoir are chairs with backs shaped like a runic cross. They are made of pine-wood, inlaid with narrow strips of silver, and all was done by the Roumanian peasants.

Everyone, from the highest to the lowest seems to have a good word to say for Queen Marie. She certainly works hard for the people whose country she has adopted, and does much for the peasants, whom she is always trying to help in some way or another.

On her marriage she was presented with a large sum of money by the women of Roumania. The money was to be used to buy herself a wedding gift.

But in acknowledging it she said that, with the permission of the donors, she would put it aside, and, when she had discovered the needs of her adopted country, she would spend it for the good of the Roumanian women.

The money was duly invested, and ten years later was used to found a school of household economy, which has ever since been doing most excellent work.

At this school the girls learn to housekeep, to wait at table, do cookery, and accounts. Marketing, laundry work, the making and mending of linen, and the making of their own clothes are also taught, and they are turned out really capable women.

The King and Queen have six children. The eldest son, Prince Carol, is now twenty-one. Next comes Princess Elizabeth, who is said to be the prettiest princess in Europe, and two other girls and two more boys complete the family.

The King is a Roman Catholic and the Queen a Lutheran. It was determined that any children they might have should be brought up as members of the Greek Church.

QUEER UNITS OF MEASURE.

Those in Use Among Some of the Barbaric Tribes of India.

The inhabitants of the Lushai hills, like other barbaric and savage peoples, have standards of weight and measure that they find simple and intelligible, but that are very confusing to the stranger who encounters them for the first time. In his book on the Lushai-Kuki clans Lieut.-Col. J. Shakespear tells about their units of measure.

In every village there is a small flat basket, the size of which is fixed by the chief, which is used for all retail dealings in rice and the like, but they measure large quantities in loads, a load being about fifty pounds. After the harvest the unhusked rice is piled in a conical heap. A Lushai will tell you his crop is chip zawn, meaning that the heap is level with the top of his head, or silai zawn, when it is level with the end of his gun held up perpendicularly over his head. That is about the record crop; lesser quantities are denoted by the height of his hand or hoe or axe held up. He measures time by the cooking of a pot of rice—about an hour—or by the time he can hold a sip of nicotine in his mouth. He has names for each period of the day, denoting his usual occupation at that hour; he also divides the year according to the agricultural occupation proper to the different seasons.

Short distances are measured by parts of the human body, as we speak of a span; but the Lushai has sixteen or seventeen of these, extending from chang khat—that is, the distance from the tip to the first joint of the first finger—to hlam, which is the distance a man can stretch with both arms extended. Longer distances the Lushai describes by such terms as the distance of the nearest jhum, the distance of the farthest jhum, the distance a mithan will wander during the day, the distance a man will travel before his midday meal, terms that perplex strangers, although they are well understood by the people.

There are few measures of [illegible]. One is chutal, as much as a man can support hung from the tip of the first finger, palm downward. Many of the stars and constellations have names; most of them have some story attached to them. Some months are lunar months and some have names, but these are not widely known or used.

FOOD FOR CANNON.

A First-Hand Impression by Mabel Potter Daggett.

So the battalions went through the streets of London day after day with a smile on their faces. And none of the Britishers who stood on the side walk cheered. They couldn't. There was that awful lump in every one's throat. Here were the best and the finest and the strongest young men, the ones meant to be the fathers of the next generation, and they never would be. Instead they were going out to slaughter and be slaughtered by all the best and the finest and the strongest young men of all the other races. And some of them weren't even young men at all. They were just little boys whom you ached to put your arm around and say "Stay dear." But you couldn't. And the next week or the week after they would be lying somewhere in a foreign land stiff and stark, those young, young faces with staring eyes upturned to the sun.—Pictorial Review.

Caught!

Her Mother—You say your husband has been cruel to you. What has he done? Young Mrs. Snaps—He keeps bare fishhooks in all his pockets.—London Telegraph.

War Transforms Use of Artillery For Man-killing

British experts in comparing the artillery of the Germans and the allies agree that the present European strife has transformed big-gun practice. They emphasize the use of the howitzer, formerly a bombardment weapon, for man killing purposes, and also in the open field, which hitherto was unknown.

Frank admission is made that the Austro-German forces have larger howitzers, but it also is claimed that in light and heavy artillery the allies are as well provided. Doubt is expressed as to a sufficient supply of eleven-inch howitzers by the Austro-German forces. Of the 42-cm (16.5-inch) howitzer one writer says that there is little doubt as to its existence, but questions if there are more than two pieces of this large calibre weapon in the field. If they were used at all, he believes it was at Liege.

These experts also admit that the Russians have no light field howitzer, but assert that the Russian field gun is the most powerful of its kind in Europe.

Speaking of the change in artillery practice forced by the present war, Col. A. M. Murray, late of the Royal Artillery, says:

"The gun is a long-range, high-velocity, man-killing weapon. The higher its velocity and flatter its trajectory the longer its range and the greater its man-killing capacity before the enemy can approach within striking infantry distance.

"The howitzer, as distinct from the gun, is a short-range weapon designed originally to throw a heavy, high-explosive shell with low velocity and high trajectory.

"The howitzer was originally conceived for bombarding purposes and for the destruction of material, but recently its use has been extended to man-killing purposes, and field howitzers, light and heavy, are now provided with shrapnel as well as high-explosive shells. When not wanted for howitzer purposes they can now be used as guns for fighting in the open.

"As the howitzer shrapnel shell reaches its target with a low velocity, in order to increase its man-killing effect, the shell has a high driving charge inside it amounting to a quarter or three-quarters of a pound or more. This driving charge increases the velocity of the bullets when they are released by the bursting of the shell.

"The introduction of quick-firing field guns, magazine rifles and automatic firing machine guns has enormously increased the man-killing power of modern armies and has compelled troops even on the offensive to seek cover to escape rapid annihilation, so deadly is the power of modern weapons of defense.

"The consequence is that battles now take the form of improvised siege rather than of open fights, one side intrenching in order to hold a position, while the other side counter-entrenches in order to take it. This is where the howitzer comes in. Entrenchments when scientifically constructed with overhead cover are practically immune against gun fire and can only be demolished by howitzers dropping explosive shells at 'steep' angles of descent onto the top of them. They can do this from their concealed positions with complete immunity to themselves except from hostile howitzer fire."

Describing the German artillery, with special attention to howitzers, Major-Gen. Desmond O'Callaghan, Royal Artillery, says:

"These weapons require a concrete platform, to which the mounting is bolted down, and their transport can only be effected on very first-class roads and over bridges strong enough to bear a weight of fifteen tons, or by rail.

"It is the 28-centimetre (11.2 inch) which has wrought all the havoc with Gen. Brialmont's steel cupolas. These pieces weigh only 6.3 tons, their total weight in action, including carriage and recoil cylinders, being 14.8 tons.

"This piece is capable of being fired up to 65 degrees of elevation and has a maximum range, at 43 degrees, of 10,000 yards. The shell weighs 760 pounds, and carries a burster of 111 pounds, high explosive.

"There is some permissible confusion in the civilian mind between guns and howitzers, and a simple definition of the latter is that it is a piece which, in proportion to its weight, throws a shell very much heavier than that from a gun, but with much less muzzle velocity and a corresponding shorter range. Take the 11.2-inch howitzer weighs, as we saw, 6.3 tons, and has a muzzle velocity, with its full charge, of 1,100 feet per second; while a modern gun of that calibre would weigh some 50 tons, and would develop a muzzle velocity of 2,600 feet a second. The howitzer can be taken into the field, the gun can only be mounted on board ship or in permanent fortifications. The gun has a range of fifteen miles.

"The more the subtle difference between the centimetre and millimetre has proved a stumbling block to many correspondents, one of them writes, for instance, of 'the terrible 75 centimeter gun,' and indeed, did such a gun exist it would be terrible, for it would have a bore of 30 inches in diameter."

Comparing the artillery equipment of the allies and the Germans, Colonel Murray says:

"Before the war it was known that the Germans had six-inch howitzers and 8.2-inch mortars—the mortar is an exaggerated term of howitzer—but nothing was known about any heavier pieces than these. In a general way it was understood that Herr Krupp had constructed some 28-centimetre (11-inch) howitzers, but it was not known how many of these howitzers were in German possession. The existence of the 42-centimetre [illegible] howitzer was quite a surprise, and some people were dubious about [illegible] official confirmation was made [illegible] the Berlin wireless message of November [illegible], in which it was stated that these mammoth pieces [illegible] were manufactured [illegible] till now.

"There is some authority for the eleven-inch howitzers, some of which were used at the siege of Liege, Namur and Antwerp, and possibly at Maubeuge, though there is no official information [illegible] about them.

"The Austrians have no light field howitzer, though one was under trial just before the war broke out, but they have a six-inch siege howitzer which throws a shell of 87 pounds, and is effective up to 7,000 yards. They also have heavier howitzers, perhaps of eleven-inch calibre, and it is known officially from Berlin that these howitzers were brought into Belgium for the siege of Antwerp.

"Though the allies have no howitzers of corresponding calibre to the eleven-inch and sixteen-inch howitzers they are well supplied with medium howitzers which up until now were intended for siege use only, but which the circumstances of the campaign have brought into the field. In addition to 4.5-inch field howitzers, of which there are some twenty batteries at the front, there is an excellent six-inch heavy howitzer firing a shell of 100-pound weight, and which has an effective range of 6,500 yards. Four batteries of these howitzers were sent out to Sir John French at the end of last September. Then there also is a 9.45-inch heavy howitzer, which throws a shell of 280-pound weight, containing a bursting charge of 52 pounds of lyddite up to a range of 7,650 yards.

"The French have no light field howitzer, as theirs 75-mm. q.f. field gun is supplied with high explosives as well as shrapnel shell, but they have a heavy 6.1-inch quick-firing howitzer which fires both high explosive and shrapnel shell, the weight of the former being 95 pounds and of the latter 88 pounds. This howitzer is a powerful weapon and also very mobile.

"For the same reason as the French the Russians have no light field howitzer, their field gun, which is, perhaps the most powerful of its kind in Europe, having high explosives as well as shrapnel shell, but it is understood that they have a large number of fifteen-centimeter (six-inch) heavy howitzers throwing shells 88 pounds in weight up to an effective range of 5,500 yards.—London corr. As The Result

SEVERE BRONCHIAL TROUBLE.

Mr. W. T. Allen, Halifax, N.S., writes: "I feel that I would be doing you and your great remedy, Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, a gross injustice if I did not write and let you know the wonderful results that I have obtained from its use.

"Last spring I happened to contract a cold. Of course, this is a common occurrence, and I did not take any particular notice of it at the time. However, it did not break up as quickly as colds generally did with me, so after two weeks, and no sign of improvement, I began to get alarmed, and went to my local physician who informed me that I had contracted severe bronchial trouble as a result of neglecting my cold. He prescribed some medicine for me, which I took for about two weeks without any sign of improvement. I was getting pretty much discouraged by then, but one day a friend happened to be in to whom I was relating my trouble, and he advised me to try Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, saying that he had obtained very beneficial results from its use in a similar case. I took his advice and procured several bottles from my druggist. After taking it, according to directions, for about two days, I noticed a decided improvement, and from that day on I began to get better, and in ten days I was in my usual health. I consider this an excellent showing for your remedy, and can highly recommend it to anyone afflicted as I was. I shall always put in a good word for it whenever the opportunity offers itself."

You can procure Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup from any druggist or dealer. Price, 25c and 50c. The genuine is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

SHORTHAND BLUNDERS.

Misplaced or Wrong Vowels Lead to Queer Translations.

A volume could be filled with amusing stories of shorthand mistakes, the greater number of them due to mistaken vowels. For instance, "This day is big with fate" was transcribed "The day is big with fat," while "Do not indulge in spite" came out "Do not indulge in spit," and "A house of many gables" was transcribed into "A house of many gabbles."

The use of the wrong vowel may have the most amusing result, as in the phrase "Man, know thyself," which was once converted in the report of a sermon into "Man, gnaw thyself." To misplace a vowel is in shorthand the easiest thing in the world. T. A. Reed, the well known reporter, tells of a pupil who by this means turned "mighty acts" into "mighty cats," and another report of a sermon was spoiled by the advice "Return a blow with an ox" instead of "a kiss."

The "reporting style," in which the vowels are omitted altogether for the sake of rapidity, is responsible for the famous American story of the shorthand clerk who took down a note of his wife's instruction to "be sure to remember to bring home some castile soap" and, as a result, returned home with a tin of oxtail soup!—London Strand Magazine.

Stiff, Enlarged Joints Limber Up! Every Trace of Rheumatism Goes!

Even Chronic Bedridden Cases Are Quickly Cured.

Rub On Magic "Nerviline"

Nothing on earth can beat good old "Nerviline" when it comes to curing rheumatism.

The blessed relief you get from Nerviline comes mighty quick, and you don't have to wait a month for some sign of improvement.

You see, Nerviline is a direct application; it is rubbed right into the sore joint, thoroughly rubbed over the twitching muscle that perhaps for years has kept you on the jump. In this way you get to the real source of the trouble. After you have used Nerviline just once you'll say it's amazing, a marvel, a perfect wonder of efficacy.

Just think of it, five times stronger and more penetrating than any other known liniment. Soothing, healing, full of pain-destroying power, and yet it will never burn, blister or destroy the tender skin of even a child.

You've never yet tried anything half so good as Nerviline for any sort of pain. It does cure rheumatism, but that's not all. Just test it out for lame back or lumbago. Gee, what a right fine cure it is for a bad cold, for chest tightness, even for neuralgia headache it is simply finest ever.

For the home, for the hundred and one little ailments that constantly arise, whether earache, toothache, stiff neck, or some other muscular pain—Nerviline will always make you glad you've used it, and because it will cure you, keep handy on the shelf a 50c family size bottle; it keeps the doctor's bill small; trial size, 25c, all dealers, or the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

IN THE POULTRY WORLD

YEARLING HENS OR PULLETS?

At the present time many are thinking about next season's breeding operations, and whether operations to a certain extent may be curtailed, but in the poultry industry there should be no reason for any reduction in the size of breeding pens, neither should proposed extensions be delayed, because eventually the poultry industry really cannot suffer, but ought to receive considerable benefit.

The old subject as to which birds are best for breeding purposes turns up every season, and each year we do not seem any nearer a satisfactory solution. There are many old hands who adhere to the belief that hens two or even three years old make the best breeders, and that it is a suicidal policy to breed from young pullets, but on the other hand, a younger generation has sprung up that is of opinion that well-developed pullets can be bred from with most satisfactory results. It would be a grave mistake and a costly one to attempt breeding from pullets at the age of six months old. We all know that the first batch of pullet eggs are small, and even if cockerels have been running with them it is seldom the eggs are strongly fertilized, and, what is most important of all, a very small percentage of them will eventually hatch out. We cannot afford to set broody hens or run incubators and have little prospect of success. We must know almost for a certainty that the eggs are likely to prove very serviceable, because it is only by careful selection, especially in the early part of the year, that hatching operations can be brought to a successful issue. If the pullets are nine months old, or some of them ten to twelve months, and have commenced laying their second or even third batch of eggs, we can rest assured that for breeding purposes and egg production they are safe.

Now, in the utility section the best of birds are much below standard weight. Big, clumsy birds generally prove exceptionally poor layers. My idea of first-rate breeding pens is to use well-developed pullets because from them winter eggs are a certainty. Of course, if one has say, twenty or thirty well-moulted hens, birds that were completely over moult in October, possibly started laying in November, then these, if they are still producing eggs, will be ideal breeders, but the difficulty is in getting hens so far through moult as to start laying. I have seen birds which have been moulting in September and gone on in dragging fashion until December, and then no eggs from them.

If one wants to have a perfectly-selected breeding pen, one could not do better than have four well-developed pullets, and four yearling hens that have come through the moult mated to a vigorous early-hatched cockerel. How many people recommend yearling cocks as being superior to mate with pullets, believing, perhaps, they produce stronger chickens, but this is not correct. If we want strongly fertilized eggs in large quantities during the early part of the season, old birds are not reliable; I have tried them times without number, and in most cases been disappointed, but on the other hand, if we have strong, vigorous cockerels, we know that the eggs will probably be fertile and hatch out well. Eight or possibly ten hens on free range are quite sufficient for one male. Later in the season, say towards the end of February and March, there will be no harm whatever in breeding from pullets that were hatched the previous April or even May. It has been done several times with good results. Those who rely on yearling birds miss many early chickens as a result. Of course, there is another way of looking at it. Yearling hens can be obtained at comparatively moderate figures, while pullets, such as White Leghorns, Anconas, and Campines for non-sitting purposes are very expensive. This is the reason, perhaps, why so many try breeding from old birds and are late with their chickens.—Farmer and Stockbreeder.

NOTES.

Prepare now for the early spring hatches. The early bird is the one that catches the worm, and so with the wise poultry raiser. The early hatches are surely the profit payers. They make good layers as well as fine future breeders.

The utility and fancy combination is each year getting closer together, in spite of the cry of some unprogressive poultry keepers, who claim the two cannot be combined. At the Lakewood (N.J.) show Columbian Queen's offspring won first cockerel, first pullet and they were fine specimens and were sold at the show for a good figure. A few feet away was the winner in the Rhode Island Red class, which at the last laying contest had made a record of 263 eggs in the year. This Red hen is a fine type as well as elegant in color. Columbian Queen holds the world's egg-laying record. So it can be seen that the two can and are being combined.

The biggest problem in successful poultry is properly rearing the chicks from incubation to maturity, and to do this means a chain of beforehand essentials—first the proper breeders cared for in the right way to promote health and strong, fertile eggs, then the proper handling of eggs to the incubator. Then comes proper incubation, and the real test of properly growing the chicks for the first four to six weeks.

Some years ago the 200-egg hen was scoffed at. Many so-called experts said it was impossible. To-day the fact is proven, was proven then by some, but many of the powers that be would not accept the statements of practical progressive breeders. The same class scoff at the idea of the utility and the standard-bred fowls combination, but nevertheless it has been accomplished, and more so each and every year for those that wish the combination, and, like the 200-egg scoffers, in a few years the fact will be accepted by the general public. There is no egg type, and the trap nest has proved it. All any fowl must possess is body enough to hold a good pair of lungs, heart and egg organs. The rest is up to the progressive breeder. The color of eye, size of comb or the angle of tail have nothing whatever to do with egg-production.

Rust-Proof Ironwork.

A simple method of making ironwork proof against rust is to heat it until it is almost red-hot, and then brush it over with linseed oil. This makes a varnish which, unlike ordinary paint or enamel, does not chip off.

FARM DRAINAGE

Hints for Farmers On Methods and Results.

With the price of wheat and other grains far above normal now, the problem which naturally presents itself, to the thrifty farmer is now best to increase the crop yield, and the question of drainage is receiving more consideration than before.

There is very little land naturally so dry as not to be susceptible of improvement by artificial drainage, for land is never in a perfect condition in that respect, unless all the rain that falls on it can soak down to the minimum depth required for the healthy development of the roots of cultivated crops and then find vent, either through a naturally porous soil, or by artificial channels.

The consideration of cost need scarcely be considered, if it is true, as asserted, that the increase of crop will pay the expense of tiling even in five years. But it is agreed, by many, that two or three years is the longest time necessary, while often, the increase in the first year's crop pays the cost of underdraining many a large. For these reasons the underdrainage of farms in the north has progressed from, at first, a hesitating, doubtful trial, until the present, when one who does not "tile" is difficult to find, while a few years ago he who did drain properly was the exception. Twenty-five years ago wooden ditches imperfectly made, and lasting only a few years, were used to some extent in Indiana and other western States. Ohio had already been using, to a limited extent, tile for drainage, and although the work met with bitter opposition, because of the expense, the advocates of progress slowly gained ground, showing their faith even by borrowing money, when necessary, to buy tile, farmers being convinced that, if it paid to borrow money for anything, certainly it might well be done to push drainage. Mark the result. Wet lands yielding from 10 to 25 bushels corn per acre, changed into fields from which 60 to 75 bushels were annually gathered; prices advanced from $30 to $75, or more per acre, and today tile factories are running to their fullest capacity to meet an increasing demand for their products, despite the fact that millions of dollars have already been invested in ditches.

For You–a wonderful Book on Farm Drainage—FREE!

Do you know you can take as much crop off 100 acres properly drained as you can off 200 acres not drained and save half the labor?

It's a fact. Do you know that proper, [illegible] tile drainage assists [illegible] lengthens the season, prevents surface washing, makes your land lighter to work, prevents drought and increases the quantity and improves the quality of your crops?

Why not have us send you, today, free of charge, a very interesting booklet on this subject? Much to learn—nothing to pay. Don't neglect anything that will help you grow better, bigger crops. Proper drainage means as much as two dollars in your bank account for every one that goes there now, and the Government lends you money for the Tile if desired.

KEEPING UP FERTILITY.

For convenience of classification we may divide all means by which land is made more fertile into four systems:

1. The direct addition of plant food, either by means of farm manures or by commercial fertilizers. This also includes the use of amendments such as lime, salt and plaster, which, while not generally required as a plant food, are, nevertheless, often of great value.

2. The mechanical improvement of the land by culture and drainage, the effect of these operations being both to set free fertility and to allow a more ready penetration of the soil by the roots of the plants.

3. The use of cover crops and of crops for green manuring and growing of leguminous plants. By the use of this system it is sought to supply humus to the soil, to bring up fertility from lower depths and in a case of leguminous plants to fix the free nitrogen of the air.

4. Land is also enriched by the yearly addition of small quantities of nitrogen in the form of ammonia and nitric acid contained in the rain and snow.

More than 90 per cent. of the fertility which the hand of man adds directly to the soil consists of farm manures. Our neglected manure piles stand ever as a monument to our stupidity and as a plea for the agricultural school master.

Fully 25 per cent. of the resulting fertility is lost through ignorance and neglect in caring for and applying manure.

After farm manures, if fertility is to be applied direct, it must be sought in the form of commercial fertilizers.

We do not wish to decry or deny the great usefulness and value of commercial manures, but only to call attention to the ridiculously small part they play in agriculture, and to the fact that at present so far as the applied fertility is concerned, the great source is the weather-beaten, burned-out manure pile. Nor can the manufacture of these concentrated manures be indefinitely increased, at least, not without a great advance in price. Most of them at present are by-products largely of the slaughter house, and these, while enormous in amount are nevertheless limited. Nature has seen fit to distribute the phosphoric acid pretty widely, but has packed the most of the potash and nitrate of soda into two small districts of the world, and it is not known at present just how much the supply of these can be increased.

Another system of improving the land is by tillage, drainage, sub-soiling and allied operations. This may be considered as the mechanical part of the husbandry.

There are three principal reasons for tillage: to eradicate weeds, to conserve moisture and to make available plant food. Everybody believes in the first, and to very many farmers it is the only reason. It doesn't take a great philosopher to see that a cornfield choked by quack grass and mustard would be benefited by the cultivator. Comparatively few have come into the knowledge that the same treatment makes rain less indispensable and fewer still have come to see that cultivation makes inert plant food available. Weeds are often blessings in disguise because they make us cultivate. The tramping of the horses' feet, the friction of the mouldboard and landside of the plow, the attrition of the soil particles one upon another, the exposure of the soil to air and sunshine and frost, all these and the accompanying chemical changes have the effect of setting free the elements which the plant must have. So, too, the old and just now somewhat neglected practice of underdraining has the effect of making the soil more friable, open, permeable to the roots of plants and with a greater capacity to store water. These mechanical effects, together with the simultaneous chemical changes make this one of the most striking means of soil improvement.

Still another system of maintaining fertility is by the use of crops to be grown and returned to the land direct—that is cover crops and green manuring.

There are several advantages of a cover crop, among them being the prevention of mechanical loss of soil by washing or blowing away, the catching of soluble fertility which might leach from the soil if no plants were present, the addition of humus to the soil, the root solution of inert plant food which is thus made more available, and, providing the legumes are used, another and most important advantage, the fixation of free nitrogen from the air. There is a great field for growing such crops as rye, rape, crimson clover, and the like, which may be obtained at a very small expense after the regular crop is harvested. Most long cultivated soils have deteriorated more owing to bad mechanical condition consequent upon the loss of humus than the exhaustion of the plant food. A crop on the ground is a strong safeguard against the loss of manures by leaching, and this rule is at least simple and practicable: Applications of soluble manures are best made to the growing crop or on lands where a crop will soon appear. Finally lands are enriched by the nitrogen which falls upon them. Most of the work of estimating the nitrogen thus received has been done in Europe, and the amount is found to vary within wide limits being greatest near cities and in the summer season, and in the first portions of water falling in a rain. As a rough average it may be said that the soil receives per acre, each year, from six to eight pounds of ammonia and from two to three pounds of nitric acid, besides small quantities of combined nitrogen in other forms. In exceptional instances this amount has been greatly exceeded. As a rule, however, the amount is of relatively small importance.

NOTES.

An average plant of wild mustard will produce about 15,000 seeds in a season.

Horse owners should be particularly watchful of new horses taken into the stable, as they may have a mild form of glanders or farcy, both of which are incurable, deadly and extremely contagious to horses and to human beings as well. A horse with a running nose may be as dangerous as a mad dog.

Vegetable-growers say they prefer acid phosphate to acid slag. The latter is also right for long-season crops. Professor Lippman says that acid phosphate hastens germination of seed, increases resistance of young plants to injurious organisms and makes a better root system.

Five to eight years is the most that alfalfa should be permitted to grow. When an alfalfa field is broken up in the large alfalfa roots become available for the crop first planted after alfalfa.

In order to secure the greatest increase in soil fertility from alfalfa, it must be fed to live stock on the farm and the manure carefully saved and returned to the fields.

In making up a dairy ration we should use at least two kinds of roughage and three kinds of grain. This gives a variety to the ration, which makes it more palatable.

That the indiscriminate use of nitrate of soda in peach orchards is likely to increase the cost of the crop is the opinion of an experimenter.

It is just as important for a farmer to weigh his milk as it is for the grocer to weigh what he buys and sells instead of going by guess. One farmer kept track of the time required to weigh the milk from his herd. He found that it took one-half a minute to weigh the milk from a cow for one milking, or a minute a day—about six hours a year. Weighing the milk results in finding that some cows do not pay for the feed they eat, to say nothing about the work required in caring for them. Wouldn't it be worth six hours labor a year to know this? It will save many times six hours' labor, and harder labor than weighing milk.

DEADLY ANAEMIA

Nine Women and Girls Out of Every Ten Are Afflicted With This Trouble.

It is an unfortunate fact that nine women and girls out of every ten are afflicted with anaemia—which means bloodlessness—in one form or another. The girl in her teens, the wife, the mother and the matron of middle age all know its miseries. To be anaemic means to be pallid, with dark marks under the eyes. You are breathless after slight exertion. You feel worn out and depressed all day. You have no desire for food and often cannot digest what little you do take. Headaches, backaches and sideaches make life miserable. If you sleep at night you do not feel refreshed in the morning and are utterly unfit for the day's duties. If neglected, anaemia almost surely leads to deadly consumption. Renewed health can only be obtained through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills—the most reliable blood enricher ever discovered. These pills actually make new, rich, red blood; they bring brightness to the eyes, and the glow of health to pale cheeks. They have literally saved thousands of women and growing girls from the grave, and what they have done for others they can do for you if given a fair trial. Here is the proof. Mrs. Wm. Kierman, Watrous, Sask., says: "I have used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills with wonderful results. I suffered for upwards of two years with anaemia in a severe form, and was doctoring all the time with no benefit. I was so weak I could scarcely walk. I suffered from severe headaches and at times from backaches that were almost unbearable. The trouble affected my digestion, and this caused additional discomfort. Finally through the persuasions of a friend I began the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and I shall ever be grateful that I did so, as after using nine boxes I was fully restored to health. I would earnestly urge all anaemic women and girls to use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for I feel confident from my own experience that they will renew their health."

These pills are sold by all medicine dealers or may be had by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

First Fiction Known.

The "Tale of Two Brothers," written 3,200 years ago by the Theban scribe Enoana, librarian of the palace to King Merenptah, the supposed Pharaoh of the Exodus, is the oldest work of fiction extant.

The tale was written apparently for the entertainment of the crown prince, who subsequently reigned as Seti II. His name appears in two places on the manuscript, probably the only surviving autograph signatures of an Egyptian king.

This piece of antique fiction, written on nineteen sheets of papyrus in a bold hieratic hand, was purchased in Italy by Mme. d'Orbiney, who sold it in 1857 to the authorities of the British museum, where it is now known as the D'Orbiney papyrus.

Kidney Disease in Every Symptom

WHY MRS. MARK FOUND QUICK RELIEF IN DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS.

New Brunswick Lady Who Suffered for Six Years Tells How She Found a Speedy Cure.

Miscou Harbor, Gloucester Co., N.B., Feb. 15.—(Special)—"For some five or six years I was troubled with backache. I tried many tonics, but kept growing steadily worse, until I decided to try Dodd's Kidney Pills. They gave me almost immediate relief."

This is the statement of Mrs. A. Mark, well known and highly respected here. Asked to give more particulars in regard to her case, Mrs. Mark said:

"My trouble started with a cold, and gradually grew worse. I had stiffness in my joints and cramps in my muscles and suffered from neuralgia. I had heart flutterings and headaches, my sleep was broken and unrefreshing and I was always tired and nervous. I had dark circles under my eyes. I was irritable and often dizzy and had a bitter taste in my mouth in the mornings. I also had attacks of rheumatism.

"It just took three boxes of Dodd's Kidney Pills to fix me up."

Every symptom Mrs. Mark mentions spells kidney disease. That's why she found such quick relief in Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Here is a fact worth knowing when you cook eggs. A spoonful of flour added to the grease in which eggs are to be fried will prevent them from breaking or sticking to the pan.

A solution of ammonia, applied three or four times to a cold sore, will remove it, if done when first felt.

Pickles may be kept from moulding over by laying a bag of mustard on top of them.

A tablespoonful of salt, sprinkled over the coals, will brighten the range fire quickly.

After the dust is wiped off a mirror, a little camphor on a cloth will brighten it.

If eggs are scarce and you are making a pumpkin pie, use a tablespoonful of flour in place of one of the eggs you would have used, and you will never know the difference, at least, others will never notice the difference.

To raise the pile of plush, sponge with chloroform.

To keep nickel ornaments on stoves and various articles bright, use ammonia and whiting. Mix together in a bottle and apply with a cloth. A very little gives a fine lustre.

It is a good plan to pepper a carpet thickly just where any heavy piece of furniture has to rest on it, as this helps to keep the moths and other insects away.

Nuts when bought ready shelled should be scalded, dried in the oven and put away in glass jars.

When next making griddle cakes add a little brown sugar or molasses to the batter, the cakes will brown better and more easily.

When boiling turnips add a little sugar to the water; it improves the flavor of the vegetable and lessens the odor in the cooking.

The work of cleaning white paint should be divided between two people, one doing the washing and the other the polishing. The washing should be done with soap and warm water and a piece of flannel, the drying with a piece of old linen, and the polishing should be done immediately with a soft duster.

Cold slaw is greatly improved by the addition of a few leaves of parsley chopped fine with the cabbage or two or three stalks of celery chopped with the cabbage. A rich mayonnaise should always be used for slaw unless a French boiled dressing is preferred.

YOUR OWN PRIVATE DESK, BOYS—IT'S A BEAUTY, AND HERES HOW TO MAKE IT

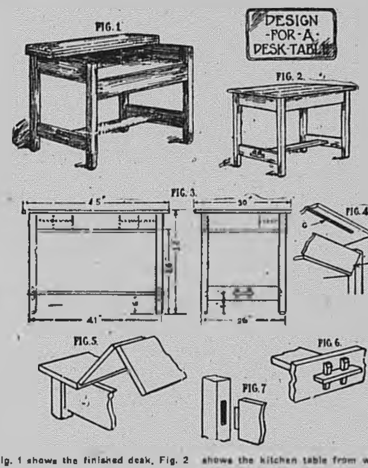

Fig. 1 shows the finished desk, Fig. 2 shows the kitchen table from which it is made. The other drawings are described in the text.

Here's a desk, boys, which you can make and have all for your own. It is designed especially for boys, and if you want to give it as a present to an older person you must put casters in the legs in order to make it high enough.

It will be ornamental for your own study room or for the family library or living room.

To begin with, it is a common kitchen table, as illustrated by Fig. 2. Our first work is to remove part of the top and one of the side rails. Study Fig. 1 and this will be easy to understand. It is presumed that three boards form the top of the table and that two are removed.

When this is done and the long side rail taken out we can build in the false bottom, which will be the top of the desk or writing surface. This is easily done by turning the table upside down and nailing boards to the short rails. A rail is that part of a table that connects the legs at the top.

Out of light lumber make whatever compartments or pigeon holes you wish and tack them in place. The picture suggests four compartments on each side of the central opening each of them large enough for letter paper. Four cigar boxes might be rebuilt and used advantageously for this purpose.

We now fit the removed rail back in its place and hinge it on, using four hinges, spaced uniformly. The board first put back is hinged to swing upwards and the other is hinged on so that it will swing down. This very simple and necessary arrangement is shown clearly by Fig. 5.

This practically finishes the job, save for the finishing, which consists of a thorough smoothing process, then two coats of prepared stain and one of varnish.

Now to explain the nature of the drawings. Fig. 3 is a view of the end of the side of the table and shows every piece of lumber in the assembled article. In Fig. 4 "G" is a groove in the under side of the table top, into which the compartment box mentioned is slid. With this arrangement it need not be nailed in place, but may be glued. Fig. 7 shows the joint used to connect the short lower rails to the table legs. Fig. 6 shows how the flat stretcher board is joined to the lower rails just noted.

VALUE OF ELASTICITY.

Shown in the Sand Blast as Well as in Catching a Ball.

A sand blast consists of a stream of sand and compressed air shot from a nozzle and is used for polishing or cutting hard materials or cleaning paint off metals, etc. It is also used for etching figures on glass. Now the question arises as to what the glass is covered with in those parts that are to remain free from etching.

A thin sheet of rubber is used, it having been found that the sharp sand particles will rebound from the rubber, although cutting deeply into the glass. As rubber is much softer than glass it seems more or less peculiar. The explanation lies in the fact that the sand particles striking the rubber take a longer time to stop than those striking the glass, and it is a law of mechanics that the longer it takes a given body to stop the smaller the force exerted on the object struck.

This is a well known phenomenon in other ways. A player catches a baseball with a backward swing of his hand instead of holding it rigid. The mitt itself allows the ball some time to stop before the stuffing is compressed sufficiently to become rigid. A pair of eyeglasses dropped on a carpet do not break, but do dropped on a cement sidewalk from the same height. They have the same amount of energy to be destroyed by the body that stops them, for they fall from the same height, but the carpet took longer to stop them than the cement.

The same reasoning applies when a man is hit on the jaw and on the fleshy part of the arm with the same amount of force in each blow. Damage is done to the jaw, but not to the arm. Thus, if a fat man be kicked, nothing in the world is hurt but his dignity.—Chicago Herald.

A Battery in Your Mouth.

A dead frog, kicking convulsively as it hung from the iron railing of an Italian balcony—this was the first electric battery!

Luigi Galvani, a scientist born in Bologna, Italy, in 1737, had hung the frog on the balcony by a copper wire. He noticed that every time the legs touched the iron the frog kicked. He believed this proved the frog's body contained electricity, but modern scientists know that the electric current was generated because the copper and iron were in contact above, while they were also connected by the body of the frog which had been soaked in a solution of salt and water. It is on this principle, of two metals joined at one edge and immersed in an acid solution, that scientists have invented the "galvanic cell," and it is called after Galvani.

You can make a primitive electric battery in your own mouth, if you wish, by placing a small piece of zinc and a piece of copper on your tongue and letting their edges touch. You will note at once a peculiar bitter taste. This proves that the metals, together with the salty saliva on the tongue, have made an electric cell of your mouth!

DIED AT HOSPITAL
Mr. Archie L. Walker, a farmer from Alviston Ont, died at the Bruce County hospital on Friday last. The late Mr. Walker who was 67 years of age was operated on by Dr. Sinclair on Wednesday last for what was supposed to be a minor internal malady, but when the operation was commenced it was found that he had been suffering from cancer and was beyond recovery death coming on Friday. The remains were shipped to Alvist n for interment.

NO TRUTH IN IT
A story was in circulation last week to the effect that John Russell, son of Mr. Robt. Russel had been killed while fighting with the Princess Patricias regiment in France. This, however, is not true and originated from the fact that in the Canadian casuality list there appeared the name of John Russell, but the victim was a married man, whose home was in Calgary. It also transpires that the local boy is not with the Princess Pats and has not yet reached the firing line with his regiment.

DIED IN HANOVER
Mrs. Richard Brockelbank a former resident of Brant died at the home of her son, Joseph in Hanover on Sunday last at the advanced age of 82 years after a lengthy illness from a general breakdown of the system. The late Mrs. Brockelbank resided on the 4th. concession Brant for a great many years and moved with her son to Hanover on Feb. 1st. She was one of the township's most respected citizens and her demise is generally regretted. She it survived by four sons and three daughters, viz: Wm. H of Walkerton Thos. of Melville, Sask, Ad of Calgary and Joseph of Hanover and Mrs. Tindale of Hanover, Mrs. Dan McNaughton of Brant and Mrs. Teate of Brant. The funeral which was largely attended took place to the Hanover cemetery yesterday.

SUSPENDED SENTENCE
Jack Cahoon employed as hostler at the Walker House appeared in the police court on Tuesday on charges of having committed the serious offence of indecent assault on two different occasions. The offence leading up to the charges being laid was alleged to have taken place in the Walker house on Monday, the little daughter of Mr. Ward the proprietor, who is as yet not two years old, being the victim. The second charge, which was not pressed by the authorities was alleged to have taken place in the Queen's Hotel last summer, when Cahoon it is asserted was caught in the act of maltreating one of the girl employees of the hotel. After taking the evidence on the first charge Magistrate Tolton allowed the defendant his liberty on suspended sentence after reprimanding him severely.

WOMEN'S INSTITUTE.
Dr. Hall will give an address to the Women's Institute at Mrs. T. J. Cunningham's on Thursday, March 4th.

DISSOLVED PARTNERSHIP

FARMER'S CLUB.
A joint meeting of the Brant and Hanover Farmers' Club will be held in the Council Chamber, Hanover, Tuesday, March 2nd at 8 p.m. All interested in agriculture are cordially invited. Mr. Duff, of Markdale, and Mr. N. C. McKay, of Walkerton, will address the meeting.—C. Lamb, Sec'y.

MARRIED IN TORONTO.
The marriage of Miss Elza J. Johnston, second daughter of the late Mr. Robert Johnston of Brant Tp., to Mr. Thos. Cook, took place at the Methodist parsonage, Grange Avenue, Toronto, on Wednesday, Feb. 17th. by Rev. E. F. Church. Mr. and Mrs. Cook will reside in Toronto.

INSTALLED IRON PLANER.
Mr. Seraphine Ellinghausen of The Walkerton General Casting Foundry installed a new iron planer in his foundry, last week, and is now ready to do all kinds of iron planing. This machine, which cost over $500 is the very latest type and guarantees first-class work

DEFEATED IN HANOVER.
The local High School hockey team went down to defeat before the Chesley school team in Hanover on Friday last, they having to content themselves with the small end of a 10 to 4 score. The game despite the one-sided score was keenly contested and was witnessed by a large crowd of rooters including many hockey enthusiasts from Chesley and Walkerton.

WIARTON DEFEATS SARNIA.
The Wiarton O. H. A. Intermediate team have taken another step towards the silverware by defeating Sarnia in the tunnel town on Saturday evening by 5-4. The return game which is being played in Wiarton as we go to press (Wednesday night) will surely result in a win for Wiarton. Walkertonians in general wish the Wiarton septette every success, both in the O. H. A. and the N. H. L.

ILLUSTRATED LECTURE.
On Friday evening, Feb. 26th, the Walkerton people will be tendered another treat in the shape of an illustrated lecture to be given by Prof. Will of Toronto University. The Topic "German Cannon and Gallic Art," will be fully illustrated by splendid views and will be well worth the small price of admission. A good program will be given besides. A silver collection not less than 15 cents each will be taken at the door. Proceeds in aid of the Red Cross Society.

DAUGHTERS OF THE EMPIRE.
The Daughters of the Empire wish to acknowledge with thanks the following donations received since their last regular meeting. Soldiers Aid Tea-room $50; Johnston's Corners School, proceeds of Box Social $[illegible]; Young men of the town surplus from dances $8; Max Player $1 30 and Helen Wilson $5. They appreciate very much these additions to their funds. A large shipment containing 90 pair of socks and other supplies was sent on Feburary 12th to the Red Cross Headquarters. The chapter would be grateful if those who still have work out would send it in as soon as possible that another shipment may be made in the near future.

DIED IN LUCKNOW.
A despatch from Lucknow which appeared in Tuesday's London Advertiser, refers to the sudden death of Mr. J. G. Murdock, a member of the county council, who is well-known here, as follows:—

Citizens were shocked this morning to hear of the death of J. G. Murdock, reeve of Lucknow, during last night, at his house, on Ross street. Mr. Murdock had officiated as an elder in the Presbyterian Church in the morning and had also attended the funeral of Walter Stewart. On returning home he complained of a slight illness which proved to be acute indigestion, from which he died shortly before 1 o'clock this morning. Mr. Murdock was for some time president of the West Bruce Liberal Association. He was also president of the local branch of the Lord's Day Alliance and president of the Farmers' Elevator and Shipping Company. He was an enthusiastic curler and bowler, always manifested an active interest in the welfare of the community. His wife and three small sons survive him. He was a member of the I.O.O.F., which order will conduct the funeral service on Friday afternoon, interment to be at Greenhill Cemetery.

OPERATED ON.
Miss Mae Campbell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Archie Campbell was operated on in the Bruce County Hospital on Tuesday for appendicitis. The operation was successful and Miss Mae's many friends will be pleased to know that she is recovering.

$20 AND COSTS.
Jno. Fisk the Indian lister, who appeared before Magistrate Richardson on Wednesday last on a charge of being under the influence of liquor was found guilty and fined $20 and costs. This will not only be a lesson to Fisk but should also be a warning to other listers, who are inclined to insist on having their wee drop, regardless of consequences.

OUT ON BAIL.
David Robertson a bachelor farmer of Kincardine township appeared in the police court here on Thursday last on a charge of attempted rape alleged to have been committed on January 15th, on Ethel Gulliver a girl under 14 years of age from the Barnado Home. From the evidence produced, it appears that the little girl was making her home across the road from Robertson's with a neighbor named McKenzie and on the day of the alleged crime, was found alone in the house by Robertson, who according to the girl's story made advances to her. No evidence was submitted for the defence by Mr. O. E. Klein who is defending the prisoner and the magistrate sent him up for trial, granting him his liberty on furnishing bail to the extent of $2400. The girl in the case was taken back to Toronto by an official from the Home.

W.C.T.A. MEETING.
The women temperance prayer meeting held in the Baptist church last Wednesday evening was well attended. Rev. Rock, pastor of the church presided and spoke of the great work of the W.C.T.A. was doing the world over and briefly referred to the late Frances Willard and also to the representative, Mr. Oscar Irwin who these women are supporting at the front. A well rendered solo was given by Mr. A. Langham. Rev. Walker of the Methodist church gave a fine address on the relation of the present war to the liquor traffic and among other things said this war has more than ever branded the liquor traffic as quoted. Russia as prohibiting the manufacture of liquor, France as forbidding the use of their national drink during the present war and of the curtailing of the traffic in England by lessening the hours for sale and Mr. Walker was listened to with the utmost attention of all. Mr. A. Royce then favored the meeting with the hymn, "Weighed in the Balance and Wanting" which in itself was very appropriate and by a warning for all not to trifle with the intoxicating cup and its attendant evils lest we to be weighed and found wanting. Rev. McLelman and Sanderson and three members of the local W.C.T.N. led in prayer. Meeting closed by singing, God bless our native land and benediction by Rev. Rock.

DEFEATED IN LISTOWEL.
The hopes of the Walkerton hockey team for being runners up in the contest for the silver of the Northern League were suddenly blasted on Wednesday of last week, when they were defeated in Listowel by the one-sided score of 14-4. Everyone is ready to admit that the better team won, but the large score registered against the locals is accounted for by the fact that they were handicaped on the narrow ice and were not given a square deal by the referee. However with no disparagement to the locals, all things considered, we have to hand it to the Listowel team, every one of whom are good stick-handlers, excellent skaters and know the fine points of the game. This however, is not much credit to the town as most of them are imported players. The Colts journeyed to Listowel by special train, accompanied by about two hundred rooters all cheered lustily for them but notwithstanding this they could not get going the first half ending with the score of 8-2 against them while in the second period they notched 2 to their opponent's 6, making the final score 14-4 which gave the round to Listowel with a margin of six goals. This has finished league hockey in Walkerton for this season but some good exhibition games will be played in the near future, among the teams expected to come here are Harriston, Mount Forest and Wiarton. Although the Colts who are strictly home-brews, have been defeated, they should be congratulated on the very credible showing they have made, this having been the most successful hockey season in years. They went down to defeat before an aggregation of imported players and therefore losing the round is no discredit to them. We hope to see them remain here for next season in which case with this year's experience, they should give a better account of themselves than they have this season which would be going some.

COMMUNICATION

To the Editor of The Telescope

In speaking of dealing and trading at home, we have been informed, that although we have two foundries in this town, our iron retailers get almost all of their supplies from other places. Why should this be, when they can secure their supplies right here in town and in doing so they would thereby leave considerable money with the citizens and working men of the town.

A. FRIEND.

Letter from Paris.

During the past week, the TELESCOPE received the following letter from Paris, France, written by Mr. Adrian Reaburn, son of Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Reaburn, who has been in Paris for many years. Mr. Reaburn is agent for the American Express Co., and New York Central lines in the French capitol. We extend our thanks to him for his communication, which our readers will find to be of a very interesting nature.

Paris, France, Feb. 11th, 1915.

Editor "The Telescope"
Walkerton, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

While returning to the office this afternoon and noting in passing along from the station the various little street scenes, it came to me that here was something altogether different from the Paris known to the average traveller, and that it would be of interest to jot down on paper a few impressions in regard to same.

Paris, up to the declaration of war, had become an exceedingly noisy city, full of trams, motor omnibuses, automobiles and various modes of conveyance known to the modern and cosmopolitan city, together with the usual hurrying crowds of people bent on business, pleasure or both combined, both French and foreigners: but when war was declared, a vast change came over Paris and its people. For some time there was even more movement than usual, but a very different kind. The American tourists filled the various steamship and shipping offices, and at first sight it appeared as if half the "States" had suddenly been transferred to Paris, so full was the city of our American cousins with their high pitched voices asking imperiously all sorts of questions, both practical and ridiculous, but all to one end, namely, "What was the safest and quickest way to reach God's Country." The trains from Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Belgium and other European countries continued to discharge multitude upon multitudes of vast throngs of Uncle Sam's citizens in hospitable Paris, with the result that a great number of even wealthy people were held up here without funds of any description which were of value, and had to be temporarily assisted in various ways. Finally, however, this host managed in one way or another to get back home after leaving practically all their baggage to follow them later when the steamship service had somewhat settled down.

In addition to all this, the mobilization of the French army during the first four weeks after the declaration of war, put a stop to passenger service on the several railroads, with the exception of a few trains a day, while on the other hand, they were busy transporting to the front regiment after regiment of the regular troops as well as conveying the units of the reserves to their concentration camps. Seeing all this vast movement in operation brings home the fact that war on the present scale makes of all but a few of those concerned therein but infinitesimal parts of a great machine, and that the customs and habits of whole nations and continents are changed at one stroke: peaceable office employees of today are tomorrow en route, along with thousands of their fellow-workers, to distant fortresses to help in repelling the invader, and whole offices are emptied as if by enchantment, no one left to carry on the ordinary affairs of life but the older men whose military service is over for good.

At the present time we have reached a sort of stalemate, with a gain here and a loss there, but the general situation remains as it has been for the past couple of months, but everyone is anxiously awaiting Spring, and trusting that there will then be such a strong and impetuous forward movement, on the part of the Allies, that the Germans will soon be fighting and in their own country, and that Autumn will see the end of this terrible scourge which is devastating all Europe, not only that part of it which is actually engaged but all the so - called neutral countries who are forced to mobilize their total fighting strength at such stupendous cost to themselves.

But to back to impressions; or more correctly, novel scenes, we today saw from the great Paris, St. Lazare, station a whole company of new recruits of young Belgians in full uniform, marching through the main streets of the city, just as if they were in their own country and were used to doing the same thing day after day, while probably here and there in the crowds of people watching them you see groups of English regulars, French

The British Navy On North Sea Duty

The Men On This Hard Task Are Said To Be Hardly Well Enough Fed

(By Archibald Hurd.)

A story is told of the captain of a ship, who, in interviewing his new cook, remarked: "Well, I see you have been at sea before, but never as your captain's cook. Now, always remember that the happiness of the ship's company—indeed, the success or failure of the commission—depend entirely on you, for if the captain does not have well-cooked meals—particularly breakfast—there will be trouble for everyone."

I am reminded of this anecdote by a letter which has reached me on the feeding of the navy. The welfare and temper of others on board ship besides the captain depend on good food of a suitable character, well cooked. This correspondent writes:

Notwithstanding that our men are undergoing hardships of all kinds—more particularly those engaged on the cruisers which are doing patrol duty night and day in all kinds of weather—nothing has been added to the rations of the lower deck ratings, and consequently the ordinary food supplied in times of peace is being served out.

I have no doubt that under ordinary circumstances the official rations are sufficient, but now that the men have to withstand the rigors of a winter in the North Sea, I am fully satisfied they are insufficient, especially for growing youths. You have probably full details of the food supplied to our men, and may I ask you that you will examine them? For breakfast bread and tea, and the same for the afternoon meal. It is true each man receives 4d. per day, but how far will this go in purchasing from the canteen such items as bacon, cheese, etc., particularly as the charges are much in excess of those existing in shops or stores? . . . It will, I am sure, appeal to you that rations suitable for, say, the Mediterranean, the Pacific, or Persian Gulf are quite inadequate for withstanding the intense cold of the north. True, the men have warmer clothing, but you must keep the fires inside going more strongly if you want the machinery of the body to work satisfactorily.

WINTER IN THE NORTH SEA.

This is a subject on which nothing has been said in public, and one wonders whether the Director-General of the Medical Department has made any representation to the Board of Admiralty with reference to victualling. Doctors agree that a diet which may be very good in hot weather is unsuitable in cold, particularly winter at sea in northern latitudes. It is quite as essential to keep the body properly stoked as the furnaces of the ship. Letters from officers of the army in the trenches reveal the craving they have for sweet things, and the explanation is simple: sugar is warming. The same is true of fat. Of all foods the men of the fleet just now require sugar and fat substances, even if they have to forego their tinned salmon and anchovy paste.

The navy is a mystery to the civilian ashore. How is it fed? Lieut. C. Vivian Osborne some time ago described the victualling of the navy in the following passage:

Each man is now allowed a standard ration valued at 6d, consisting of a half-pound of beef, one pound of bread, one pound of potatoes, one-half ounce of chocolate (enough to make a pint), one and three-quarter ounces of tea (which provides tea for three meals) and two pounds of sugar a week, one-quarter of a pint of fresh milk in harbor or of condensed milk at sea. Pickles may be taken instead of the jam ration, and coffee instead of a portion of the tea ration. Half a gill of rum per day is allowed to men over 20 years of age. In addition to this, every man gets an allowance of 4d a day, which is intended to be spent on food, and which can be spent either at the ship's store or at the canteen, or, if preferred, need not be spent at all.

From the ship's store the men can get at very low prices a further quantity of any of the articles enumerated above, or haricot beans, marrowfat peas (both preserved in casks), suet, tinned salmon or tinned rabbit. The two latter are great favorites, and can be issued instead of the weekly corned beef ration; or, at the canteen, the men can get fresh vegetables, fish, sausages, eggs and bacon, suet, fruit, cheese, ham, in fact, almost any food which appears desirable to a man of the working classes.

That the canteen of the present day is an excellent institution there can be little doubt. It is under careful Government supervision both as regards quality and price of the articles sold, and for the privilege of its monopoly the canteen firm pays a rent which in a large ship amounts to some £300 or more. This rent is used as a ship fund entirely for the benefit of the crew, to forward sport, to assist entertainments and charities, and to aid the wives or widows of men who have been injured, or who have died in the ship. Thus, by combining a standard daily ration with an allowance which the men can spend themselves, a nutritive diet is assured, while the sameness of routine is avoided.

The meat must have been killed one day before delivery, and before purchase is very carefully inspected by an officer who has received special training in this work.

The meat is all English, for the sailor is very particular in this matter. Some years ago, when mutton was first introduced to vary the monotony of continual beef, a large consignment of excellent New Zealand mutton was supplied to the ships in one of our home ports. The men heard that the mutton was from New Zealand, and with one accord threw it into the harbor.

THE FLEETMAN'S MEAL HOURS

The standard of quality of the navy's food has never been better than it is to-day; that, in justice to the director of victualling, is conceded—in fact, one yachtsman now holding a commission said that he had never seen food of better quality.

What are the meal hours?

He starts at 5 a.m. with a pint of cocoa. That is meal number one. Meal number two is at 8 a.m., three hours after the first so-called meal, during which time he will have been continuously on the job, often in cold, bitter weather, with beautiful salt water splashing up to his knees, and perhaps a pull in a duty boat for four or five miles, at any rate we believe the first meal will have been pretty well digested by the time his duties allow him to again refresh himself. The second meal will provide him with a pint of tea or coffee, bread and butter, with perhaps a bloater, kipper, or portion of corned beef, according to fancy.

Then follows four hours of various work and the meal of the day, consisting of joint, vegetables, and perhaps a sweet of some sort to follow. Another four hours and tea is served, which is just a light meal of a basin of tea and bread and butter, sometimes jam. At 7.30 p.m. he has a supper, if so disposed, purchased entirely out of his own pocket; at all events it is so in ninety per cent. of cases. This is followed by any exercise the individual cares for, and he usually retires to his hammock at 10 p.m.

Now, the points that emerge from the consideration of this question of the dietary of the navy are three. First, the quality is good; second, the variety is much greater than it was; third, the cooking is better than it used to be. As has been pointed out previously in this column, the health of the navy has greatly improved ever since Lord Fisher's food reforms were introduced. The real matter of doubt is whether, in view of the climatic conditions of the North Sea, which are extremely harsh and unpleasant, the dietary is capable of improvement as a temporary measure to meet temporary conditions. It goes without saying that the nation desires that the fleetmen shall have food which will nourish them and keep them warm and fit. Whether the existing naval dietary is the real one for men who are facing the hardships of the North Sea, and is incapable of improvement, is a matter on which only medical men can speak with authority. The question is certainly worth investigation.

New Powder Makes No Flame

Flashless powder is probably being used by artillery in Europe. No official statement has come across the sea that this remarkable shell and shrapnel from field guns, but the probabilities are that it is playing its part in the great struggle.

It is a wonderful thing that cannon may be fired day or night without revealing their position. In the days of the charcoal powders a cloud of white smoke belched from a gun at the moment of discharge. Sometimes it settled around the gun position, sometimes it hung over the field of fire, sometimes it rose high, and sometimes floated away, but it always instantly revealed to the enemy the position of the gun or guns, no matter with what secrecy the artillery had occupied its position and no matter how cleverly it had been masked. At the first fire the guns told where they were and became a target for other guns. In those days the guns were laid for direct fire where the target is visible through the sights of the gun and the gun may be visible from the target and the smoke told its story to the enemy.

With the incoming of the nitroglycerin and nitro-cellulose powders only a whiff or haze of bluish thin smoke left the gun at the moment of discharge. It was not visible at a short distance from the gun. Dust blown from the ground in front of the gun was more likely to reveal its position to the enemy than the smoke or haze of the so-called smokeless powder. There was recently alleged to be a discovery of making a field glass which would show this bluish powder vapor as dense smoke, but a good many discoveries that arrive at the state of publication never arrive at the state of fact, and this peculiar smoke-revealing glass may have been one of these. Guns may be put in position now where the enemy is invisible from the enemy's position, and no smoke will reveal their location. The aeroplane and other machines are relied on to find where those guns are firing.

But smokeless powder was not flashless powder. Fired at night a glare showed the approximate position of the gun. The glare from the three-inch field piece was visible for miles, and the darker the night the brighter the glare. The blast of light from the defiladed gun might give no information as to range or distance, but it told the story of direction. By the invention of a flashless powder the glare has been so reduced that at a reasonable distance from the guns their position will not be betrayed.

In the London Mail of late date W. Beach Thomas, in an article on The French Officer at the Front — A Soldier and a Gentleman, wrote, among a good sum of other matter, this:

"One commandant, who must, I know, have fought very finely, talked with me one day for some five hours round the only subject, but what he talked was not so much war as peace. The man had a passion for peace. He was clearly a considerable mathematician and somewhat of a man of science. He had studied closely the science of artillery. He told me, for example, of experiments, now being successfully concluded, for the manufacture of a powder which produces a blue flame on explosion—a color which is virtually invisible at night. But his interest was academic, though practical. He hated nothing more than explosives. The sight of a shattered bridge roused him to a passionate outburst. 'These things belong to humanity, and it is a great crime against humanity that they should be shattered to the four winds.' He regarded the war solely as a tragic [illegible] to a greater and permanent gain. The deaths and pains of men, the cruelty to horses, the loss of harvests, the ruin of peace of mind, the breaking of the quiet passage of civil life, the shattering of historic buildings—all these filled him with a great righteous wrath."

Therein was the reference to flashless powder. It cannot be an accurate statement that the experiments are now being successfully concluded, because experiments have been long under way in the United States Army, and the belief is that they were successfully concluded some time ago. Three years ago Captain William J. Westervelt of the fifth Field Artillery, United States Army, wrote a book on Gunnery and Explosives for Field Artillery Officers, which was published by order of the secretary of war, in which he said:

"In recent years the belief has grown that military powders should not only be smokeless but flashless as well, so as not to disclose the position of a firing unit. The ordinary form of smokeless powder has a very high temperature on explosion, and when the projectile leaves the gun the strong luminous flash, with unburnt slivers of powder coming out with the blast, is clearly visible for great distances. The problem has been fairly well solved; the field artillery board has experimented with a reasonably satisfactory flashless powder, and comparing its visibility with that of service powders has recommended,

"'That the present service powder has a flash of such brilliance as to make dismounted and mounted defilade practically useless, so far as concealment is concerned.

"'That if flashless powder can be made to give as good ballistic results as the service powders they are to be preferred.

"'It is believed that before long the service will be supplied with a powder quite as good ballistically as the present powder, and at the same time practically flashless.'"—Washington Star.

HAD A BAD COLD
WITH PROLONGED COUGHING.
TRIED NEARLY EVERYTHING
FINALLY
DR. WOOD'S
NORWAY PINE SYRUP
CURED HIM.

Mr. William H. Graham, [illegible], B.C., writes: "[illegible] about the middle of last October (1913) I caught a cold which got worse in spite of all treatment; I could [illegible] about November 22nd, a friend said 'Why not try Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup?' [illegible] I can most heartily recommend Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup to anyone with a severe cold, as its powers are most marvellous, and I never intend being without it at all times."

When you ask for "Dr. Wood's" see that you get what you ask for. It is put up in a yellow wrapper; three pine trees the trade mark; the price, 25c. and 50c.; manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

The Common Cold.

This is the season for head colds. Almost everyone is suffering from a cold of greater or less severity, which is quite as communicable as any of the more dangerous communicable diseases. After one has passed the age of five years colds are not so dangerous, and can usually be "worked off," but before this age and especially during the period of infancy, colds are very dangerous because they usually produce bronchitis and frequently broncho-pneumonia, which is a very fatal disease for babies.

Once the baby has contracted a cold it is rather difficult to cure it, so that the obvious thing to do is to prevent its occurrence. Keep baby away from all who have colds, especially when they are coughing and sneezing, for it is in this manner that the disease is transmitted. If the mother has a cold and the baby is nursing at the breast the mother should keep a towel around her head, covering her nose and mouth, while baby is nursing. Baby should sleep in a separate room from any one who has a cold. By following these simple rules he can usually be kept free from the disease.

If baby already has a cold he should be seen by a doctor, if it is at all severe. In any case it is important that the air he breathes should be fresh, warm and moist.

Reserve Officers Are Heroes.

Among the reserve officers now serving at the Royal Naval Barracks, Chatham, are three who are each wearing the Royal Humane Society's medal and the Stanhope gold medal for the bravest deed of the year.

War News Affected Her.

Many people who have been reading the terrible war news from day to day, especially those who have relatives at the seat of war, have become so nervous that it is impossible for them to sleep.

The nerves have become unstrung and the heart perhaps affected.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills will build up the unstrung nervous system and strengthen the weak heart.

Miss Hilda Dicaire, Martintown, Ont., writes: "In August, 1914, I [illegible] for my health. I was visiting friends in London, and heard of the war. It made me so nervous that I could not sleep, but after using Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills I improved greatly, and could take my school again. I have recommended them to many of my friends."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c. per box, 3 boxes for $1.25 at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Chats With the Doctor

BY A PHYSICIAN

RHEUMATIC ARTHRITIS.

This disease, often called rheumatic gout, occurs most frequently in elderly persons, and particularly attacks women. Where there may be any inherited tendency to the disease, the person must take great care of the diet and avoid constipation, which is absolutely fatal to diseases which arise from rheumatic constitutions. In the first place, rheumatic gout being set up by the retention of poison in the blood, food has a marked effect upon its production. Rheumatic persons should also drink plenty of milk and take walking exercise without unduly tiring themselves. The first symptom is usually a slight pain, growing worse in damp or wet weather; this pain soon increases in violence, the joint grows stiff and the head of the bone gets flattened in the joint. Masses of new bone grow out and surround the joint, producing after a time great deformity.

Damp house and damp situations must be avoided and the underwear should always be of wool. Carlsbad salts are perhaps the best to take. Even a small dose of Epsom salts taken in a glassful of hot water the first thing in the morning has had beneficial results. Rubbing the joints well with camphorated oil, the last thing at night, is sometimes of value in easing the pain. Vapor and Turkish baths are also very beneficial, and a very hot bath, in which a large handful of soda has been dissolved, if taken immediately before going to bed, will do good. Any treatment must be long continued, and in fact, even when the joints appear to have become supple there must be well regulated, as an attack may return at any time. Nor is the system really quite rid of the disease, even though it may be warded off for a long time. This disease can only be checked if it is taken in time before any serious deformity has infected the joints.

THE CAUSE OF A RED NOSE.

A red nose may be caused by many things, and frequently depends upon the individual's physical state. Nervousness, indigestion, extreme cold and chilblains are some of the causes, as well as congestion of the circulation in any part of the body. If arising from any of these causes they must be removed before the color of the nose will become normal. When caused by chilblains the red nose is bound to recur with the return of cold weather. Preventative measures are the best. The simplest remedy is to saturate a sponge with benzine and hold it to the nose for five minutes before going out in the cold, or before entering a heated room. Never eat anything that disagrees with the digestion, and wear warm woollen clothes next to the skin. All clothes should be loose and comfortable, as when the circulation is bad, any tightness in this will restrict the flow of the blood and tend to increase the redness of the nose.

A CRYING BABY

A day or two ago I read an astonishing article upon the value of crying for a baby. It gravely stated that a baby should be allowed to cry for its good, but that three or four hours a day would be quite sufficient! Poor little mite! And baby that cries for three or four hours during the day, would certainly be a fit subject for a doctor's visit. There is a mistaken idea that crying is good for infants. It is nothing of the sort. A comfortable, clean and well cared for baby will not cry [illegible] It is the [illegible] baby that cries continually. Crying is [illegible] for a baby, and may result in its seriously injuring itself. When a baby cries take it up and examine it [illegible] that it is perfectly comfortable, then if it has been so that it will not face the light, and the baby will generally drop to sleep almost at once. Regularity [illegible] success in managing a baby, but do not let it cry for hours under the mistaken idea that you are strengthening the baby's lungs. The crying is only exhausting the poor mite, mentally and physically.

NASAL CATARRH.

This trouble often starts with a cold in the head, and if neglected may continue a long time until it becomes chronic. The mucus collects and drops down the back of the throat and causes many unpleasant symptoms. The treatment requires to be persisted in for some time. Pour a teaspoonful of chloride of ammonium into a quart bottle and pour over it a pint of boiling water. Inhale this vapor through both mouth and nose every evening before going to bed. In the morning sniff up the nostrils a teaspoonful of water in which a teaspoonful of common salt has been dissolved. Spit out any of the solution which gets into the throat. Rub the nose well with a little vaseline.

STYES ON THE EYELIDS

Styes generally consist of inflammation at the roots of the eyelashes. They generally denote an impoverished state of the blood, and the general health needs inquiring into. Iron is a good tonic to take and the dialysed form, ten drops in water twice a day after meals, which usually works wonders. The local treatment of the stye is to foment it with hot water until it comes to a head and shows a yellow spot. This should be pricked with a sterilised needle. This will permit the matter to escape, and if the place is well bathed with hot water in which a little boracic acid has been dissolved, the inflammation will soon subside.

CHILBLAINS.

These are the plague of life in winter with a great many children, not so much with grown-ups. Happy is the man or woman to whom they are unknown. Once, years ago, I was consulted by a grey-haired professor of over 81—a clergyman he was—for a tiny swelling on one of his toes, which proved to be a chilblain. He had never seen one before. The best preventive is plenty of exercise, and not putting the feet [illegible] near the fire for warmth, but warmth by friction or exercise. [illegible] But over and above the result of exposure—either to undue heat or to coldness—is the state of the blood to be considered. As a rule chilblains to any extent affect persons who are insufficiently nourished, and who need better food. Oatmeal, eggs, cocoa, plenty of milk are usually indicated for the babes who suffer, and not seldom you may give stimulants with considerable advantage—say a tablespoonful of good port wine twice a day to a child of 10-12.

REMEDIES.—The remedies for chilblains are innumerable. Nothing is better than iodine, some use iodine ointment, rubbed in twice daily. But tincture of iodine painted on each night cures promptly. Often a single application is sufficient. "Broken" chilblains, as they are called, are the worst form of the plague. That always means malnutrition, and usually poverty in the house. The ordinary chilblain has suppurated, and an ulcer has been established. Dress this with resin ointment, thickly spread on lint and change twice daily. Feed the child well and give it a little wine if possible.

PIMPLES ON THE FACE.

There are various kinds of pimples which affect the face, and all are decidedly objectionable. One form especially affects young people of both sexes between the ages of 14 and 20, who are naturally sensitive to their appearance, and who become often very depressed at the resistance of the trouble to the remedies the doctor advises. They need never worry; with a little patience all will come right. This complaint, technically termed acne, usually disappears spontaneously when full growth is reached; even when no particular treatment has been followed.

TREATMENT:—The best thing these boys or girls can do is to bathe the face night and morning for ten minutes in very hot water; then rub it dry with the roughest towel they can procure. Before this any blackheads should be carefully squeezed out with thumb and finger. [illegible] Pimples later on in life generally signify unwholesome living in some way, mostly in the way of eating and drinking. [illegible] though occasionally pimples, as well as boils and carbuncles, spring merely from [illegible] If these troubles do not appear intermittently, the first step to be taken is to have the system overhauled and properly cleansed. And the second is to eat plenty of fresh fruit and vegetables. It is well always to avoid salt meats, salt fish, bacon, pork, with highly seasoned food of any kind.

ANAEMIA

Anaemia, or deficiency of red corpuscles in the blood is nearly always the result of some unnatural habit of living; that is of course, when it is not merely the symptom of serious organic disease, and so to be treated only in accordance with the doctor's expert advice. [illegible] Young girls from 15 to 25 often suffer from a more pronounced form of anaemia, technically termed chlorosis. [illegible] the figure of the Venus de Medici—the most beautiful female form of antiquity—is no less than 27 inches round the waist. [illegible] both sexes (though woman is the worst offender) would do far more to elevate the physical tone of the race, than any other measure that can be pointed out. Nearly all the diseases of female life arise from early neglect. At every young ladies' school the insistance of an after-breakfast visit to a place that need not be named should be a routine event. It is far more important towards a virtuous life than even the Catechism. Properly nutritious food is the first essential for anaemic persons of each and every degree. Iron, of course, helps: the best vehicle is the Pharmacopoeia tincture in 15 drops doses, freely diluted, and given after meals. In very bad cases a drop of arsenic in solution greatly helps the good effect. But these drugs should always be dispensed by a qualified chemist; or there might be trouble. Plenty of outdoor exercise is of course essential to every healthy life; only it should always stop short of fatigue for those who are not strong.

Largest Electric Generating Set.

The Philadelphia Electric Company is constructing a new electric generating station on Christian street, where will be installed the largest prime mover electric generating unit ever built.

The turbo-alternators will make up the entire equipment of the new plant. The first will be a [illegible] kilowatt set and the second a 30,000 kilowatt set. The first-mentioned machine, now under consideration at the Schenectady plant of the General Electric Company, is the largest generating set ever built. It consists of a steam turbine engine direct connected to an alternating current electric generator. The set measures over all 61 feet 2 inches in length, 21 feet 7 inches in width, and 15 feet 10 inches in height. Complete, it will weigh 500 tons. The turbine is a 5-stage Curtis machine operating at a steam pressure of 215 pounds. The largest surface type condensers ever built are used in connection with this engine.

SLANDERING THE LADIES

(Brantford Expositor)

The only thing which would seem to make it reasonably certain that the [illegible] skirt is to return, for a time at least, is the fact that it looks ridiculous. And anything ridiculous is sure to appeal to the feminine fancy when it comes to deciding what to wear.

"BUSINESS AS USUAL"

IMPRESSIONS OF THE BRITISH UNDER THE STRESS OF WAR

(Bishop Wm. F. Anderson in Christian Advocate.)

"Business as usual" [illegible] which greets one everywhere in the London marts of trade and in other cities of Great Britain at this time. It is a pretty accurate expression of real conditions. If a man were to be dropped out of some other planet into the heart of London, he might easily conclude that conditions were about normal, barring, perhaps, a [illegible] subject of the war and the contents of the newspapers. [illegible]

While the [illegible] "a nation of shopkeepers," it is expressive of a national characteristic which is very striking. The imperturbability of the typical citizen of Great Britain these days is something of a surprise to an American in view of the gravity of the situation. It must be admitted, as is often noted, that the Britisher is a rather smug and comfortable individual. Let no one suppose, however, that he has not a reason to give for the faith that is in him. If he is questioned as to why he is so composed under present distressing conditions, his answer is ready at hand.

When it is suggested that the enemy is likely to invade the British Isles, our friend smiles significantly and remarks that he is rather of the opinion that the British "navy" will have something to say upon that subject. Those of us who dwell in the vast domain of America hardly appreciate how absolutely essential to the very life of Great Britain is the defence of an incomparable sea power. The Englishman not only sees the relation of this to the well-being of his country, but he swells with pride at the thought of her admitted primacy upon the high waterways of the world. Nor has his confidence been in the least shaken by the losses of recent weeks. His comment is that "the ship was an old one and really did not contribute much strength to the navy's fighting power," or "the loss is not great in comparison with the total strength of our fleet"; or, "naturally we must be prepared for some reverses."

THE MINISTRY BEHIND THE GUNS

You will also find the English citizen having the unction of solid comfort to his soul because of the character and ability of the men who are directing the affairs of the government and carrying forward the expedition of the war. It is a frequent comment that Great Britain has probably now as strong a government as in all her history. It is indeed, the rather justifiable boast of the Liberals who are now in power. Already Prime Minister Asquith is written up as one of the very greatest of Premiers in the entire history of the nation. In the estimate of many representative men of the present, he ranks even the great Gladstone, for it is declared that Gladstone never did and never could have done what Mr. Asquith has achieved for popular government and democratic ideals. A galaxy of brilliant names may, with all consistency, be mentioned in the same connection.

Sir Edward Grey, Secretary of Foreign Affairs, commands the confidence of all parties in the nation to a most remarkable degree. In this respect he is not only in the first class, he is in a class by himself.

Mr. David Lloyd-George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, is probably the best hated and the best loved man in England—loved by the people, among whom he is truly one; hated by the ultra-aristocrats. But the balance turns more and more to the side of confidence, admiration and even love. When it is remembered that the cost of the war to Great Britain is a million pounds per day, the magnitude of his problem will be appreciated. He is a veritable Napoleon in finance. The loan of three hundred and fifty million pounds went through like lightning, under his masterful hand, with many thousands of pounds to spare.

Mr. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, is the youngest of the "Big Four," being [illegible] That he has the daring of youth no one will question. There are times when he is charged with being impulsive—yes, even reckless; but the answer of his friends is that this is a time in history when aggressive leadership is required. To have seen this great quartette of Britain's leaders day after day last autumn in the halls of Parliament, earnestly at work upon the nation's problem and destiny, was an experience never to be forgotten.

Secretary McKenna, in charge of home affairs, and a number of other leaders who are grouped naturally with this distinguished company, are contributing in large fashion to the general confidence of the entire population.

A SECOND "BIG FOUR."

Turning away from Parliament to the battle line, it is seen at once that "K. of K." Kitchener of Khartoum—stands out as the man of the hour. A distinguished Irishman points to him as a fine illustration of the saying that an Englishman possesses all the characteristics of a poker, except its occasional warmth; but in the estimate of the English nation, Kitchener knows the business of warfare and will make good in this conflict. Field Marshal Sir John French, Admiral Jellicoe and the dauntless Lord Fisher, now seventy-four years young, as they delight to say, together with Kitchener, for another "Big Four" in whom the Great Britain of to-day has unshaken and perfect confidence.

A WELDED EMPIRE.

Recent happenings have produced a situation which contributes much to the general feeling of security. It is the confidence in a united empire. At the time of the Boer war there was much division of sentiment, and many good and conscientious men could not go with the Government in approval of that expedition. But to-day there every man, woman and child is convinced of the necessity of Great Britain's part in the war under present conditions. I happened to be in the House of Parliament the day that John Redmond, in a thrilling speech, committed unqualifiedly the whole Irish constituency. And this solidity of sentiment seems to include not only the British Isles, but all parts of the Empire. On another one of those eventful days, report was made as to the attitude of Canada, Australia, South Africa and India. It is said that there has been no such day in Parliament in many years. The report from India evoked the wildest enthusiasm. [illegible] The present attitude of those who fought against England in the Boer war, notably of General Botha, is regarded as one of the greatest tributes which could possibly be given to the wisdom of Britain's treatment of her colonies. And certainly it would be difficult to gainsay the claim. Such a transformation in the brief period of twelve years is, indeed, a notable triumph.

CONFIDENCE IN THE CAUSE.

But the chief source of comfort in the experience of the British people is in their belief in the downright justice of the Empire's participation in this war. If it be suggested that it means a long struggle, involving great loss of life and of property, the answer invariably is, "What else could we do? Now that Britain has kept her word, no sacrifice is too great, either of life or of property. If our representatives had betrayed us by a cowardly shirking of our responsibilities, we would have had no heart for anything, we could only have hung our heads in shame. But now that the honor of the nation is preserved and Britain's word and bond are both permanently established at their face value, though at great cost, everything we have is at the service of the country in its hour of need." "Thrice armed is he who hath his quarrel just" has made its way from the classic pages of the Bard of Avon into the very bone and sinew of the nation's life. This is the message of the pulpit to the people of England at this time, whether of the Established or Nonconformist Church. It forms the undercurrent and spiritual tone of the public services which are largely and earnestly attended on both weekdays and Sunday. The teachers and preachers of morals and religion are making the hour of the nation's stress and strain an opportunity for a relegation of faith in and dependence upon the living God.

One evening a few weeks ago an American met upon the streets of London a British soldier who had just returned from the battle line. Taking him by the hand, the American said to Tommy Atkins that it was a brave part which he was playing and that issues so important as to involve the whole cause of civilization were involved in the struggle; that personally he (the American) felt a debt of gratitude for the service rendered to the cause of liberty and progress by the defence of honor and of right. The soldier disclaimed any credit for the sacrifices made in the hardships of life in the trenches, but simply replied, "It does seem, in view of the interests at stake, that every man of stuff should offer himself gladly for his country's welfare, doesn't it?" And Britain's men of stuff are enlisting with a rising tide of enthusiasm for the protection of the nation's flag, the security of the Empire, and the advance of civilization.

ORIGIN OF THE CURFEW.

The Cover Fir Bell Was Rung Way Back in King Alfred's Time

What is the curfew? Its etymology carries its history with it. The word comes from the French couvre-feu (cover fire), a bell tolled at evening as a signal to the inhabitants to cover fires, extinguish lights and retire to rest. It is erroneously said to have been instituted in England by William the Conqueror as an arbitrary bit of tyranny, and the nursery historian has waxed sentimental over the wrongs of the conquered Saxon, and conjured up pictures that must be balm to the downtrodden Celt. Even Thomson tells us:

The shivering wretches at the curfew sound
Dejected sunk into their sordid beds.

But the couvre-feu was known before William's time, both in England and on the continent. He did, indeed, issue an edict on the subject, and although this edict may incidentally have helped to put down the Saxon beer clubs, which were hotbeds of political conspiracies, its primary aim was as a precaution against fire. That danger was a never present one in those days of chimneyless wooden houses.

The ancient city ordinances of London abound in stringent fire regulations. None of them, however, was more effective than the "cover fire" bell, which as far back as the time of King Alfred was rung in certain places. In England, William's edict rendered compulsory an ancient custom. But it was a wise legislative act and not a bit of arbitrary tyranny. We find plenty of early traces of the custom or its equivalent, as, for instance, the blowing of a horn at the market place in continental Europe.

Kick of the Mule.

A wise man, in his own estimation, announces that a mule kicks because it doesn't know any better. This will greatly surprise many students of contemporaneous mule life. If ever there was an animal with low cunning expressed in its eye and its twitching nostril, that animal is the mule. Its ability to place a kick where it will give the greatest offence to its victim is something marvellous.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Famous Doors.

One of the most beautiful doorways in the world is that of Magdalen College Chapel, in Oxford University. It is the west door leading into the chapel, and is of Tudor architecture, with the statues of five saints placed in niches over the top entrance. Visitors must remember that Magdalen is pronounced Maudlin College by the English.

MARVELOUS BALSAMIC ESSENCES CURE CATARRH
NO DRUGS TO TAKE--A DIRECT BREATHING CURE

Statistics Prove Ninety-seven Per Cent. of Canada's Population is Infested With the Germs of Catarrh.

This disease is most dangerous owing to its tendency to extend to the Bronchial tubes and lungs, where it causes Consumption. Unfortunately the people have had faith in sprays, ointments and snuffs, which can't possibly cure, and in consequence catarrhal disease has become a national curse. Science is advancing every day, and fortunately a remedy has been discovered that not only cures but prevents Catarrh. This new treatment "Catarrhozone" has sufficient power to kill the germs of Bronchitis, Catarrh and Asthma. It contains pure pine essences and healing balsams that go to the remotest part of the nose, throat and lungs, carrying health-giving medication to every spot that is tainted or weak. You don't take Catarrhozone like cough mixture—you inhale its healing vapor at the mouth and it spreads all through the breathing organs, soothing and curing wherever Catarrh exists. This is nature's way of supplying the richest balsams, the purest antiseptics known to science.

A sneezing cold is cured in ten minutes. A harsh cough is eased in an hour, the most offensive catarrh is thoroughly drawn from the system.

For Asthma and Bronchial irritation nothing can equal Catarrhozone—every physician and druggist says so, and we advise our readers to try this treatment if suffering with an winter ill. The complete outfit costs $1.00, medium size 50 cents, at all dealers.

FARM AND GARDEN

FEEDING DAIRY COWS IN WINTER.

Economizing on the dairy cow's food supply is a great mistake. The farmer who, as winter approaches, will confine his cows to a simple feed of corn fodder, or some other cheap and ready food, is the man who is not getting the best out of his stock.

Corn is not a perfect food for a dairy cow any more than it is the proper feed for an egg fowl. For the production of milk, as for the production of eggs, a ration is required that contains a larger percentage of flesh-forming constituents than is contained in corn or fodder.

Dairy cows must be fed so as to obtain the greatest possible quantity of milk at that time. A ration should be used so as to sustain the milk flow just as long as possible. Fortunately, the food that tends to produce a large milk flow is also satisfactory from the other standpoint.

If a cow converts her food into milk, instead of putting it on her back in the form of fat, it is almost impossible to feed her too much of the right kind of grain. Of course, it is possible to be really extravagant, but on the average farms where dairying is not a specialty there is little danger of this occurring.

During the winter, when the weather is cold, and it is a good idea to give a fairly liberal ration of ground corn and cob meal, to which is added some ground oats and also some oil meal. The quantity to be fed depends entirely on the individual, and should be left to the judgment of the feeder. The cows, however, should not have more than what they will eat up clean. It is a good sign to see the bottom of the manger licked clean after every meal. A grain ration like the above, fed morning and night, and each feeding followed by a fair-sized bundle of good clover hay, will keep a cow that is in good condition right up to her maximum milk powers all the time.

There is no advantage in exposing the cows to cold and stormy weather. They become chilled and consequently get a setback. They enjoy having access to straw stacks, and a shed opening to the south makes good quarters during the daytime. It is a good plan to have a feed rack in the yard, to which the cows may have access at any time during the day, and drinking water should always be on hand so they can help themselves at will.

The milk flow can often be sustained by making gradual changes in the ration. For instance, should the cows seem to tire of oil meal or oats, it is a good plan to change to bran or to mix some good shorts along with the cornmeal. This has a tendency to sharpen the appetite. Any food that is palatable is always much more easily digested than one that is not.

Another valuable article is salt. A supply should be kept convenient all the time, so cows can have access to it whenever they crave it. This is much better than salting at intervals of once a week or so. Dairymen say that when cows have access to salt at all times there is less difficulty in churning the cream for butter, because salt really has something to do with making cream churn rapidly.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS

Professor Andrew Boss of the University of Minnesota, who has made a special study of meat and meat curing, says an animal should not be fed for 24 or 36 hours before slaughtering, because that gorges the system and fills the capillaries with blood that does not drain out well, leaving the meat a reddish color. This blood in the meat decays readily and often causes trouble in curing. Another point in regard to previous feeding is that food in the stomach decays very rapidly after the animal is killed, and if dressing is delayed a stomachful of feed may taint the whole carcass with the gases. Water should be given freely, however, up to the time of slaughter, since it helps to clean out the waste matter and give a good carcass. Professor Boss says, also, that animals should not be excited previous to killing, because that prevents the proper drainage of the blood vessels, and if the excitement is extreme the meat is likely to sour; in no case should an animal be slaughtered for meat immediately after a long drive. Especial care should be exercised not to bruise the body of the animal, for a bruise causes a congestion of blood that will spoil the meat at that point. An animal should not be losing in flesh at the time of slaughter; that means shrinking muscles and tough meat. When an animal is gaining in flesh the opposite is true. Better meat, says Professor Boss, will be secured from an animal in only medium flesh, but gaining rapidly, than from an animal that is very fat, but not gaining in flesh. Also, animals with fine bone and soft, luxuriant hair are more likely to yield a good quality of meat than those with coarse bones and wiry hair.

A horse is no better than his feet, and it does not matter how fine that form of the animal or how correct the markings, if poor feet go along with them.

A post that is well set may last longer than one which has been made smaller by sharpening so as to drive in easily, but it is seldom as solid as the driven post. When the soil is water-soaked the set post is more easily leaned by stock pushing on the fence.

Bees are useful as well as interesting insects. They produce honey, one of the best foods, and at the same time help nature distribute the pollen on the stigmas of flowers. Every home should have a few stands of bees.

Barnyard manure is one of the necessities for garden-making where the soil is poor. The manure supplies nitrogen and humus, both of which are required to make a good garden. It is best, usually, to apply the manure broadcast in the winter. It then has time to decompose and pulverize before spring planting.

Doctoring sheep is expensive and often unsatisfactory, unless the symptoms of the disease are clearly understood. If the sheep are not exposed to bad weather in the late fall and are given proper care and feed there is not much show for disease, unless brought in from other flocks. With sheep an ounce of prevention is worth much more than a pound of cure.

A garden should have perfect drainage, for, if there are depressions which hold water, the ground occupied by them will be wasted.

It is estimated that an average toad is worth to the farmer $5 a year for the cutworms alone which it destroys.

A good way to keep a horse clean in the stable is to clean out all dirt, etc., and then cover the floor about three or four inches thick with dry sawdust, as far back in the stall as the horse usually stands, then cover the sawdust with straw or the bed that you may use. The sawdust will absorb the moisture, and therefore make the other bedding last longer in case it is scarce. The sawdust should be replaced by fresh occasionally.

Bonemeal and wood ashes in equal quantities make a good lawn fertilizer. Apply at the rate of one pound per square rod, or 300 or 400 pounds per acre, at one time.

A TRIO OF TIPS.

How to Keep Aluminum Clean—As to Milk Bottles and Dried Fruit

Have you noticed the milkmen pick up a filled bottle? No? They invariably catch it up hurriedly by the top; on this account always remember to wipe the top carefully with a clean wet cloth before removing the little pasteboard piece. Be sure also to wash the mouth of the bottle before replacing this same piece.

Aluminum cooking utensils are a delight until they turn dark inside. Then they are an abomination. It is easy, however, to keep them bright. Either wash them in soda and water or boil tomato parings in them, or parings from rhubarb, and the water it was washed in alone will often do the work. So will lemon and table salt.

Never soak dried fruit or vegetables in cold water; wash thoroughly through many changes of cold water; then clean, soak them in a generous amount of tepid water, they will swell larger. Never boil them hard, but rather simmer slowly, scarcely allowing the water to do more than bubble; do not neglect the pinch of salt in the fruit and strained lemon juice of one lemon to the pound.

Body Temperature Important.

The majority of people are carriers of the germs of pneumonia, especially during the winter months. These germs are always waiting to get a foothold if the resistance of the body is lessened at any time. This resistance is lowered if the body temperature is lowered much below normal for any prolonged period of time, and particularly if the temperature of the feet is kept much below normal.

It follows that a person may go out in the coldest weather as long as the body is sufficiently clothed, especially the feet, and it does not matter how cold the air is that the person breathes as long as the body temperature is kept normal. Sleeping in a bedroom with the window open will not cause a person to catch cold unless the amount of clothing on the body is insufficient.

In these cases there is frequently sufficient clothing covering the body, but an insufficient amount of undercovering, and many of the modern mattresses are very permeable to cold drafts. This can be obviated in a simple way by placing layers of paper above and below the mattress.

FAMOUS ECHOES.

Queer Pranks of Sound Associated With Noted Places.

Everyone is familiar with echoes but not everyone knows just how they are produced and why. "Echo" is a Greek word which means sound, signifying the repetition of sound waves in the air which are reflected or thrown back by some obstacles. When the surface reflecting the waves is at right angles to their source the echo will come back to the point from which it originated, but when the surface is oblique the echo will be sent in some other direction, and will be received at some other than that of the origin of the sound.

In order that two successive sounds may be discriminated, an interval of about one ninth of a second between them is necessary. Assuming that sound will travel at the rate of 1,125 feet a second, 62 feet is found to be the least distance at which an echo can be heard, since the sound will go that distance and return in one-ninth of a second. If the distance is less the echo will only serve to cloud the sound and the one will make the other less distinct.

When it happens that there are a number of reflecting surfaces at different distances in the direction of the sound, with the proper interval between them, each gives a separate and distinct echo. A similar effect is produced if there happens to be two reflecting surfaces at an angle to each other or so as to give repeated reflections of the sound from one to the other after the manner of the kaleidoscope, resulting in a manipulation of sounds or echoes. The famous echoes of Killarney, in Ireland, belong to this class, as also does that produced between the walls of the castle of Simonetta, near Milan, which is said to repeat the sound of a pistol-shot sixty times.

Natural echoes are produced by woods, hills, rocks and mountains and many particular localities have become famous because of their echoes. One of these is outside Shipley church, in Essex, England. This echo repeats twenty syllables very remarkably. When awakened the famous echo of Woodstock, England, repeats the sound fifty times. In the whispering gallery of St. Paul's Cathedral the faintest of sounds are conveyed from one side of the dome to the other, but are indistinguishable at intermediate points.

Other famous whispering-galleries are those in the Capitol at Washington and in Gloucester Cathedral, England. In the former, persons standing 60 feet apart may distinctly hear each other speaking in whispers, and in the latter, the gallery, which is octagonal in form, conveys a whisper across the nave a distance of 75 feet.

The wonderful echo of the suspension bridge across the Menai Strait in Wales, has made the structure famous. If one of the main piers of the bridge is struck by a hammer the sound of the blow is returned in succession from each crossbeam supporting the roadway and from the opposite pier standing 576 feet distant. At the same time the sound is reflected back and forth between the water and the floor of the bridge at the rate of twenty-eight times in five seconds. —Pathfinder.

Solicitude.

"You don't know how I worry about my husband," said the tired-looking woman, as she leaned on her broom for a moment.

"Why, there's nothing to worry about," answered the neighbor. "He's fast asleep."

"Yes. But some time when I'm not there to look after him he's going to fall out of the chair and hurt himself."

Antiquity of Perfumes.

Perfumes have combined in idealizing life, through the ages, and in very early days they played a part in religious rites. Incense appeared in pagan temples, and is not only the outcome of modernity. Nearly, if not quite all, the perfumes used to-day were known to the ancients. The Egyptians have left recipes for sweet savors for the mouth, and sirens of old bewitched their victims with the mingled perfumes they used. At Roman feasts scented waters descended from above. Many flowers in classic days were specially imported to make essence, and skilled workmen were employed to blend the sweet scents. The Crusaders brought back perfumes from Arabia for their lady loves. The Chinese knew the value of musk centuries before western nations. It is penetrating and enduring, and is associated with the Empress Josephine. Half a century after her death some of the rooms she used at Malmaison were impregnated with it. Frangipani, which owes its cognomen to a marquis of that name, originated in the time of Louis XIV., and is distilled from West Indian jessamine, orris root, Tonka beans, vanilla and benzine, date back to the days of bouquet and [illegible]. Patchouli dates from the early forties of the 19th century, the dried branches being used in Malay to keep moths away. Many great men were passionately devoted to perfumes—Dumas, Hugo, De Musset and others. A writer of note describes frankincense as making men pathetic, while musk troubled the brain, and aloes drove melancholy from the soul.

An Excellent Reason.

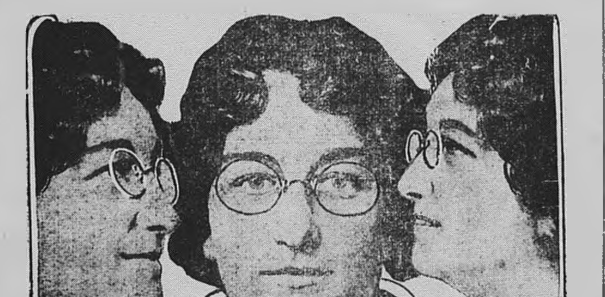
One of the stories about the late Sir Douglas Straight, the veteran journalist, relates to one of the early papers he was connected with.

He was crossing Waterloo bridge one day with a friend when he suddenly marched up to a couple of newsboys and soundly boxed their ears.

His friend, amazed at this proceeding, naturally asked him what he meant by it. "They were selling your paper," he pointed out.

"Yes, I know they were," was the reply, "but they weren't shouting it loud enough!"—London Globe.

Do You Wear Your Glasses Properly?



No. 1—Lenses tipped back at the top instead of slightly forward

No. 2.—Glasses too large. Not properly centred. Left lens too low. Lenses much too wide apart.

No. 3.—Lenses too far from the eyes, too small and too high, wearer can easily look around or under them.

SOME AIDS TO HEALTH

In order to get the intended optical effect, the eyes, when looking straight ahead, should look squarely through the optical centres of the lenses or slightly above the centres, especially if the patient is tall and so looks down more than up.

But if one eye looks through its lens above and the other more or less below the centre, as is the case when the glasses are tipped one up and the other down, the result may be to cause eyestrain.

So may trouble be caused when the lenses are farther apart or nearer together than the eyes are. If the lenses are weak, the last fault does not often cause perceptible trouble, but is better avoided.

Sometimes a little departure from this rule is allowable in the interest of a better appearance, but only with the consent of the oculist.

Sometimes it is intentionally ordered to relieve some muscular strain. As a rule the lenses should be as near the eyes as possible. There are several good reasons for this. The optical effect is better; the wearer is less likely to look around the glasses; he notices the rims less; as the glasses project less they are less likely to be knocked off accidentally; the appearance is better; so much so that it often pays to have the lashes clipped a little when they are so long that they touch the lenses when these are mounted as near as they ought to be.

They should be vertical or tipped slightly. There should not be a space between the lower edge of the lenses and the cheeks wide enough to admit a large [illegible].

It gives a bad appearance and is bad optically, as is excessive tipping in any direction. After carefully selecting the best lenses, the effect can be spoiled and the well-selected lenses made to act like an entirely different and badly-selected pair simply by tipping them so that the wearer does not look through them squarely, but obliquely.

If the patient goes to the optician and regardless of ordering a correct prescription for glasses it is fully as [illegible] have the lenses mounted so that the effect is as if a different pair had been ordered.

With very weak lenses this effect of looking obliquely through the glasses is slight, but increases and becomes very important with stronger ones. The fact that one can see better through them when they are tilted, as may sometimes be true, does not by any means prove that the effect is a good one, for, as stated above, the wise oculist, in selecting glasses for a patient, does not choose in all cases the lenses with which the patient sees the best, but, rather, those with which he can use his eyes with least strain.

It is because toric lenses diminish the bad effects of looking obliquely through a lens that they are so much better in many cases, especially for [illegible].

THROBBING, NEURALGIC HEADACHE CURED
HEAD-SPLITTING DISTRESS VANISHES INSTANTLY

This Wonderful Curative Liniment Never Fails.

RUB ON NERVILINE

Neuralgia quickly cured is twice, nay, ten times cured. Little neuralgia pains grow into big ones, but "Nerviline" in ten minutes relieves even the worst ones. Even a single application will relieve the nerve congestion that causes the pain.

Nerviline penetrates deeply into the sore tissue, reaches the source of inflammation, drives it out root and branch. Every drop of Nerviline is potent in pain-subduing power, and its strongest charm lies in the fact that it rubs right in, even to the very last drop. Nerviline is not greasy, and its pain-removing power is at least five times greater in strength than ordinary remedies.

We guarantee Nerviline will cure neuralgia—not only relieve it, but actually and permanently cure it. Just in the same way will it cure lumbago, sciatica, stiffness and rheumatism.

To conquer all muscular and nerve pain, use Nerviline. A large bottle in the home keeps the doctor's bill small. Get the large 50 cent family size bottle; it is more economical than the 25 cent trial size. Sold by all druggists everywhere, or the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

GREAT CARE NECESSARY IN LINING HAT

Final "Home Millinery' Lesson Explains How Delicate Task of Putting in Silk Lining is Accomplished.

(By Clarissa Chesley.)

Haven't you often wondered how in the world a hat which had been trimmed with some kind of fragile trimming could be lined without mussing it all up? The answer to this question is shown in Figure 2, above. You will see that the hat is held by the left hand under the right arm and that the brim rests against the milliner's body.

In order to show the exact kind of stitches, Figure 1 is used. You see there is one long stitch and then a short back stitch which is used to keep the silk from slipping.

To begin the lining buy one-quarter of a yard of thin taffeta or lining silk, the length determined by three times the diameter of the hat. First turn over the lengthwise edge of the silk a half-inch and stitch it down to form a casing. Sew the other edge inside the hat as in the picture with a long stitch and a short back stitch to keep it firm. You will see that it will be impossible then to sew the ends together in an ordinary seam, and this is another point on which amateurs have had to puzzle. Instead of seaming the ends up, one edge is turned under, over the other one, and they are then slip-stitched together. Slip-stitching, which has been referred to previously in these articles, is simply taking one long stitch invisibly under the goods and very short ones through to the other edge.

Two little holes are next cut in the casing hem and the drawstring of narrow ribbon run through, drawn up and tied in a little bow.

Carefulness in the details of putting in the lining is absolutely necessary if the amateur milliner would have a becoming hat.

THE ACUTE PAIN FROM NEURALGIA

Permanently Cured Through the Use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

Neuralgia is not a disease. It is only a symptom, but a most painful one. It is the surest sign that your blood is weak, watery and impure, and that for this reason your nerves are literally starving. Bad blood is the sole cause of the piercing pains of neuralgia; good rich blood is the only cure. In this you have the reason why Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure neuralgia. They are the only medicine that contain in the correct proportions the elements needed to make rich, red blood. This rich blood reaches the root of the trouble, soothes the jangled nerves, drives away the nagging, stabbing pains and braces up your health in other ways as well. Here is proof—Mr. C. L. Lee, Vatchell, Ont., says:—"For several years I was troubled at intervals with neuralgia in the head and chest. The pain I suffered at times was most intense. I was continually doctoring for the trouble, but found nothing to give me permanent relief until I began the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Thanks to this medicine my blood has been restored to a healthy condition and every symptom of the trouble has disappeared. I can therefore with confidence recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to all who suffer from the fierce pains of neuralgia."

You can get these pills through any medicine dealer or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

GOOD SHORT STORIES.

A Canadian named Casey was appointed to a government place. Technically it had to be held by a lawyer, which Casey was not. The Benchers of the Law Society, however, undertook to obviate the technicality. "Well, Casey," said the examiner, "What do you know about law, anyway?" "To tell the truth," replied the candidate, "I don't know a single thing." The examiner reported in his affidavit "that he had examined Mr. Casey as to his knowledge of the law, and, to the best of his information and belief, he had answered the questions that he had put to him correctly." Pin Your Faith to Live Stock

The one outstanding feature of the world's farming is that there will soon be a great shortage of meat supplies. Save your breeding stock. They are today Canada's most valuable asset. If you sacrifice your breeding stock now, you will regret it in the near future. Plan to increase your live stock. Europe and the United States, as well as Canada, will pay higher prices for beef, mutton, and bacon, in the very near future. Remember that live stock is the only true basis of economic and profitable farming. The more grain you grow, the more stock you can carry. The more stock you keep, the more fertilizer for your fields. Mixed farming is real farming, not speculating.

Study this table, which was prepared before the war. Only one country increased its cattle more than its people in the past ten years. And, in it (Australia) in 1914 there was a tremendous loss of live stock through an unprecedented drought—a fact which the table does not show. Do you need any stronger argument than this table that there is bound to be an increasing demand for beef? Add to this condition, the destruction of live stock of all kinds, breeding and young stock included, in the war zones. The war has merely hastened the meat shortage of the world. When it is over, the farmer with live stock will continue to profit in the world's markets, and, in addition to having helped feed our soldiers at the front, will be in a position to reap a further reward for having stayed with the live stock industry.

* * * *

SHEEP. Canadian farmers have been losing great opportunities in sheep raising and sheep feeding. Hundreds of thousands of sheep have been slaughtered to provide winter clothing for the soldiers of the different armies. Australia's losses, through drought in 1914, were very heavy. Canada has been importing frozen mutton from New Zealand. In view of these conditions, wool and mutton should prove very profitable for Canadian sheep raisers during the next few years.

SWINE. Through the indiscriminate sale of swine in the Canadian West in the past three months, the supply in 1915 promises to be little more than half of 1914. Add to this the fact that the British soldier is allowed ½ lb. of bacon per day, and that sausage is the principal meat food of the German soldier, and you will understand the outlook for the future. Those who stay steadily with swine, year in and year out, make money. Those who rush in and rush out, generally lose money. "Buy when others are selling, sell when others are buying," applies to live stock as well as to Wall Street stocks.

DAIRY. Milch cows increased in Canada from 2,408,677 in 1901 to 2,594,179 in 1911. This increase did not amount to 8% and was less than one-quarter of the population increase of Canada. At the same time, the per capita consumption of milk by Canadians increased 30%. Is there any wonder we had to import 7,000,000 lbs. of butter from New Zealand?

The exports of Canadian cheese have been steadily declining for ten years. Look at the market prices today. Do they not suggest the advantage of increased production?

Through cow-testing, selection and better feeding, the average annual production per cow in Canada did increase from 2,850 lbs. per cow in 1901 to 3,805 lbs. in 1911, but this is only a beginning. Last year one cow in Canada produced 26,000 lbs.

The dairymen of Denmark who supply Great Britain with butter and bacon are not satisfied unless their herds average 10,000 lbs. per cow. Let Canadian dairymen work to increase the productiveness of the milch cow. Breed for milk. Test your cows. Save your calves. Select your milkers. Feed for yield. Read the Agricultural papers and Government reports and bulletins on dairying.

AGRICULTURE IN SCHOOLS

One sign of the times is that the British Columbia Department of Education is undertaking to have agriculture taught in the schools of the province. The work was started about a year ago but it is being greatly extended. Canada must realize how important is this matter of technical instruction in farming for the farmer's children. It is our great hope for building up our agriculture.

THE REAL GENTLEMAN

Show us the man who can quit the society of the young and take pleasure in listening to the kindly voice of age; show us a man who is ever ready to pity and help the deformed, show us a man who bows as politely and gives the street as freely to a poor sewing girl as to the millionaire; who value virtue not clothes; shuns the company of those that congregate at public places to gaze at the fair sex, or make unkind remarks of passing poor girls; show us the man who abhors the libertine who scorns the ridicule of his mothers sex' and the exposure of womanly reputation; show us the man who never forgets for an instant the delicacy and respect due a woman as a woman in any condition or case—and you will show us a true gentleman.

EASY VILLAGE MONEY

There must be a lot of easy money loitering around the small towns of Ontario, wistfully longing to get out and experience life and adventure in the big world.

The ease with which village money can be enlisted for distant adventure is well shown in the evidence now being taken in a case in court. A man in his home town can go from office to office from one end of main street to the other and cannot borrow five hundred dollars to put it into his business unless he can give a first mortgage for the [illegible] are keenly suspicious of [illegible], buried in their gardens; and [illegible] hours later can leave town with from ten to twenty thousand dollars in cash and with promises of [illegible] for additional thousands in undertakings that have the same value as promissory notes. All the stranger needs to bring with him is blank forms highly legal in appearance and red seals that glitter and gleam with vast importance. When the stranger arrives in town his grip sack is filled with glowing prospects; when he leaves it is filled with hard currency.

Of course we would not think of denying that there is big money to be made in places far away. Nor would we dispute the statement that to make big money a man must take chances. But we would point out that it often happens that when a man thinks he is taking chances he is'nt getting a chance at all.

We do not wish to say anything that would tend to make money timid. But what we cannot make out is why money that is always so timid around home that its very existence is unknown to the neighbors can be persuaded to leave home on the most dare-devilish enterprise and take chances that the money at Monte Carlo would shrink from.

Perhaps if small capital would turn in and take a few chances right at home the local towns would flourish more than they do.

Denies the Charge.

In going through our exchanges this week we clipped the following letter which was written by Mr. J. J. Schumacher in answer to criticisms of the Farmer's Central Insurance Company's policies which appeared in the [illegible] Saturday night:

To the Editor Daily Planet,

Chatham, Ont.

Dear Sir:

"Our attention has been called to an article that appeared in your issue dated the 24th day of November, 1914 and headed "Fire Insurance Company is Attacked." The article appears to be an extract from the Toronto Saturday night the information emanating from a correspondent at Chatham who is an agent for stock companies.

In the said article, our policy forms are criticized. Certain conditions are described as being conditions "limiting liability." The fact is the conditions of many other companies' policies are open to certain criticism since they almost limit liability, their being a limit to all contracts. Now so far as the red printed conditions in our policies are concerned to which objection is made, some we claim give information that is necessary in a policy covering farm property, while their section of others is intended only as a safeguard and at no even increase liability. All of them can be changed or cut out by the Board of Directors or general meeting of the policy-holders. If, in the history of our company anything was ever gained on account of the conditions referred to, the policy-holders, who are the owners of the company, were the gainers. We have no stock-holders to please, consequently no dividends to provide for.

Under the heading of the article referred to appears the following statement:

"I have before me an insurance policy issued by the Farmer's Central Mutual Fire Insurance Company, of Walkerton Ont. This company does a very extensive business throughout Ontario: in fact, much more extensive than is done by any other Farmer's Mutual Insurance Company, and I think it is time the farmers were awake to the quality of the goods they are buying. As a matter of fact they are getting a low priced insurance, but the insurance is really worth not nearly the price paid when the character of the contract which could be obtained from a first class stock insurance company. The policy is a little four page affair and one page and part of the second is devoted to provisions limiting liability. One of the conditions is quoted here: Not exceeding $30 to be allowed for straw, live stock and farming implements, including vehicles, plows, etc."

Now, what are the facts? The condition in question which include the statement "not exceeding $50 to be allowed for straw, etc, is printed on the face of the policy and, being part of the contract is the only matter worth replying to. Under the said conditions are enumerated what is covered under ordinary contents usually of barn and stable, that is all the contents usually kept in a farmer's barn while only a few items are mentioned but are to be insured separately, threshing machines and stallions kept for stock purposes, for which in case of loss two-thirds of the value is to be paid; moreover it is stated that a sum not exceeding $50 is to be allowed for straw. (In our later forms the straw limit reads "not exceeding 50 per cent of the value.) Our critics interpret the wording to read "not more than $50 to be allowed for straw, live-stock [illegible]

CUT DOWN EXPENDITURES.

The report of the Ontario Highways Commission that the Ontario government spend $50,000,000 on good roads throughout the province will not be adopted by the government. The cabinet has decided not to introduce any bill asking for permission to borrow $30,000,000 for road purposes. Good roads legislation is still under consideration but the measure to be brought down will cover more than a few million dollars.

SLUMP IN PRICES OF CATTLE.

The cattle dealers have been hit hard the past two weeks, as a result of the slump in cattle prices at the Union Stock Yards, Toronto, with no immediate prospect of improvement. It appears the demand for meat outside the city has fallen off. There is not nearly so much meat being shipped to the lumber camps, and what the military camps are taking is largely the canned meat. The closing of the United States markets again is another reason for the falling off in business and slump in prices.

USEFUL INFORMATION.

We take pleasure this week in directing the attention of readers to the "Patriotism and Production" advertisement on this page. This campaign for the encouragement of the production of more food stuffs in order the the country may reap such advantages as the war situation presents, is being conducted in a most intelligent manner. It does not aim at mere boosting, but at giving sound advice and useful information. Reference is made to the Agricultural War Book in which will be found an excellent article on the importance of using the right kind of seed by the Dominion Seed Commissioner, and another by Prof. Zavitz on the production of Canadian-grown Root Seed to take the place of seed formerly imported from the nations now at war and unable to supply it. Another useful article in this Agricultural War Book is on The Farm Labor problem.

HIGH PRICE FOR AQUA PURA.

It is rumored in town that one of our young citizens who was in the recruiting class has put up a slick trick on thirsty citizens of this town before he struck out for Chicago. The current report is that shortly before he left, knowing that a summons would soon be issued to hail him before a magistrates' court, that he filled several empty whiskey bottles with pure water from the town waterworks and representing that he had to get out before receiving a summons, made a special offer of the bottles at one dollar each. The regular price being one dollar and twenty-five cents. The bar-prices appealed to the boozers as a big snap and they purchased pure Spring water from the town taps at one dollar per bottle. If the whole reservoir could be sold at the same price Chesley's debt of about $100,000 would soon disappear. Jack Hetherington, the town engineer, would neither eat nor sleep till he had the debt wiped off and a big surplus piled up.—Chesley Enterprise.

CENTRE BRUCE L.O.L.

The annual meeting of Centre Bruce County L.O.L. was held in Port Elgin on Feb. 6th, and it was one of the most successful meeting ever held. About fifty delegates were present representing Walkerton, Cargill, Paisley, Port Elgin Southampton, Wellscroft and Underwood. The report showed a very successful year. County Chaplain Rev. Mr. Hamilton, of Southampton, delivered a very patriotic and instructive address, and the bilingual school question was ably dealt with by the Deputy Master, C. H. Green, and District Master Rushton of Saugeen district gave a very able review of the work done in the northern part of the county. It was decided to hold the next annual meeting in Paisley and to celebrate the coming 12th of July at Southampton. The election of officers resulted as follows:—County Master, W. S. Mitchell, Paisley; Deputy Co. Master, C. H. Green, Southampton; Chaplain, Rev. Mr. Hamilton, Southampton; Rec. Secy, Geo. E. Smith Underwood; Fin Secy, Mr. Robinson, Port Elgin; Treas., W. C. McFadden, Port Elgin; D. of C., W. J. McNally, Walkerton; Lecturer, Messrs. White and Collard. The County Master was appointed to represent the county lodge at the grand lodge of Ontario West at North Bay, March 10th.

The History of the County of Bruce
And of The
Minor Municipalities Therein
(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)
Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps,
Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

TRUE TO HIS RACE

"You have plucked 'a brand from the burning,' which, I trust, will light all your onward life with joy."

After this there came a lull in the war-storm. The allied armies were before Sebastopol. And the siege threatened to be a long one.

Meanwhile, in February, Parliament met.

The Duke and Duchess of Cheviot, with all the rest of the great world, came up to London for the season.

Lord Wellrose resumed the labors of humanity to which he had devoted his time and talents.

Lady Hinda Moray was again the belle of Belgravia, and generally pronounced more beautiful than ever.

And this was certainly true. She was more beautiful than ever, because she was happier than ever. The light of a pure and peaceful love beamed in her face, for she loved the noble young Earl of Wellrose, and she knew that he loved her in return.

He had never told her so, but all his self-control had failed to conceal the blissful truth from her eyes.

How he struggled with his passion! How he told himself, day and night, that he should be false to every principle of honor and manhood should he suffer his affections to stray from his betrothed.

He avoided Hinda as much as possible, though, as she was his mother's guest at Cheviot House that season, common courtesy required him to be frequently in her society.

He would have left London to escape temptation, had not his parliamentary duties kept him in town.

He wrote to Suzy by every mail, and told her all the news of the day, and sent her papers, magazines, new books and new music.

But his letters were no longer the ardent outpourings of passionate love they had once been. They were as coolly friendly and matter-of-fact as her own had always been.

And, meanwhile, the months slipped away, and brought near the time when the allied armies should achieve their great triumph.

CHAPTER XXXI.

In September came the most important news. The allied armies had taken Sebastopol, and the Crimean war was virtually at an end.

This news found the Duke and Duchess of Cheviot, with the Earl of Wellrose and the Ladies Hester and Eva Douglas, at Cheviot Castle, where they were spending the early autumn.

While they were still discussing the great victory, a private letter arrived from Dr. Kinlock to the Earl of Wellrose.

After describing the taking of the city, he went on to write:

"Your brave kinsman, Lieutenant Douglas, has kept his word. With his own hand, he planted the colors on the walls of Sebastopol. But, ah! in doing this, in the face of a murderous fire, he has been severely wounded by a bullet through the left lobe of the lungs. He has been recommended for promotion, but it is doubtful whether he will live to profit by it. Certainly he will not, if he stays here. I have advised him to be sent home with the invalid troops, who are to sail for England in a few days."

Lord Wellrose groaned as he laid this letter aside, and half his joy in the great victory was turned to grief.

And even thus, throughout the land, the public rejoicing at the national triumph was tempered by the private mourning of those who beloved ones had bought the victory with their blood.

In a few days came another letter from Dr. Kinlock, in which he wrote:

"Young Douglas has received his promotion. He is now a captain, but not yet assigned to any company. I fear he never will be. He is sinking slowly, but surely. All his desire, now that the war may be said to be over, is to get back to England, to press your hand once more and die. If I were not hoping from day to day that his desire may be granted and that he may be sent home, I should even entreat your lordship to come out here and comfort the dying boy, whose wish it is to see your face."

"I will go," said Lord Wellrose to himself; then, suddenly recollecting all the circumstances, he added: "But I might miss him. Ah! he might be on his way home while I should be on my way out. I must wait for another letter from Kinlock, I suppose. And Douglas is so ill! he may die in the interval."

As these troubled thoughts passed through his mind, he turned over a leaf of his letter and read a paragraph dated a day later, and which was as follows:

"* * * I had written so far when I received a message summoning me to headquarters. I immediately reported there, and instantly received orders to go to England, by the Relief, in charge of a party of invalid troops. Captain Douglas goes with us. I am extremely glad of this, as I shall be able to attend personally on him during the voyage. We sail for Southampton the day after tomorrow. So you may expect us very soon after the receipt of this letter, if you do not see us before.

"And so he is coming home, and I shall see him again, poor, brave, gentle boy! I thank the Lord for this. And who shall say that home air and kind friends and good nursing may not save his life and restore his health?" said the earl to himself, as folded this letter and laid it aside.

Then he rang for his valet, who immediately appeared.

"Perkins, pack my portmanteau, and order the trap for four o'clock, to take us to the railway station. We leave for London by the five-forty train," said the earl, as he passed out of his room to notify his mother of his sudden journey.

He reached Southampton in time for an early breakfast.

He took apartments at the Lord Admiral. And after a refreshing bath and change of dress, and a good breakfast, he set out to walk down to the docks, to inquire for the expected ship.

He was more fortunate than he could have hoped to be. The ship had just arrived, and was at anchor about half a mile from the land.

A steam tender was already leaving the shore to bring her passengers to land.

By presence of mind and promptitude in passing a few shillings to the men who were withdrawing the gangplank, Lord Wellrose succeeded in boarding the tender at the last moment [illegible] steaming out to [illegible]

In a few moments the tender was alongside of the ship.

The decks of the Relief were crowded with—what?

Were these men "ghosts" or shadows?

They might have been Charon's passengers crossing the Styx, so pale, so thin, so ghastly they were!

Living skeletons crowned with death's-heads!

Here were the maimed, the halt and the blind; the sick, the dying and the dead.

Yes and "the dead." Many had died on the passage, and had been buried in the sea. But some had died within a few hours, so recently, so near home, that their bodies had been saved, to be given to their friends.

Lord Wellrose, from his youth up, had been accustomed to sights of misery, in his frequent personal ministrations to the wretched. But he had never seen anything like this. And he grew sick and dizzy as he gazed.

Soon the bustle of transferring these poor wrecks of manhood from the ship to the tender attracted his attention.

At length the form for which he so eagerly watched appeared. But, oh, how changed!

Was this man in the flesh, or a disembodied spirit, that approached, leaning on the arm of the middle-aged surgeon, Dr. Kinlock?

Benny was clothed in his old war-worn, battle-stained uniform, that hung loosely upon his emaciated figure. His face was so thin that it had taken an almost triangular shape from the broad forehead down the hollow cheeks to the sharp chin. His complexion was so bloodless that pale would not describe it; it was a clear, fair, transparent bluish white. His large blue eyes, sunk in their deep, shadowy hollows, seemed larger, bluer and brighter than before. His golden hair had faded to a silvery fairness. And in a word, if Benny was dying, he was as beautiful in death as is a setting star.

So thought the Earl of Wellrose, as he came gently forward and took the wan hand, and said, with suppressed emotion:

"Oh, my dear Benjamin! I thank God that you have lived to get home. And now we will hope that good air and good nursing will restore your health."

The face of the young soldier grew radiant with joy, as he grasped the hand of the earl between both his own, exclaiming:

"Yes, thank God! I thank God that I live to see you once more! Now I am willing to die!"

"We will not talk of death. We will not have you die. You have everything to live for now, Benjamin," said the earl.

But a violent fit of coughing seized the invalid, and he turned and crept away to the side of the ship, and sank down upon a seat to recover himself.

"And now, Dr. Kinlock, welcome home. And much thanks for your devotion to my—cousin, here," said the young earl, cordially shaking hands with the surgeon, whom, however, in the first moments of meeting Benny, he had forgotten.

"Thanks, my lord. I am very happy myself in the thought that I have brought Captain Douglas safe to England. And for more reasons than one," added the surgeon, so emphatically that the young earl looked inquiringly at him, as though he would have asked:

"What do you mean?"

"He is your cousin, you say, my lord," remarked the surgeon in answer to the unuttered question.

"All the Douglases are cousins, you know," replied the earl, with a smile.

"Like the Stuarts and the Campbells, and the other Scottish clans. But that is all, my Lord?" inquired the doctor, in a low voice.

"That is all, so far as I know," replied the earl, in a grave and somewhat surprised and questioning manner.

"Then, my lord," said Dr. Kinlock, solemnly, "I have something to tell you that, I fear, will startle your lordship considerably. But not now; not now! See, my patient is recovering himself. Ah, poor fellow! He is so sensitive! When he gets into those violent fits of coughing he shrinks from observation like a wounded animal. But here he comes," added the surgeon, as he arose and gave Benny his arm to support him to the side of the ship.

Lord Wellrose also lent his aid, and thus the earl and the surgeon got the invalid on board the tender, and placed him on some cushions in the stern of the deck.

Benny sank down with a sigh of relief, and wearily closed his eyes and fell into the sleep of prostration.

The young earl, standing over him, gazed mournfully down upon the fair, wan, wasted face, and then raised his eyes inquiringly to the surgeon.

Dr. Kinlock gravely shook his head and sighed.

And the earl was answered.

The sick and wounded men were all coming on board.

"Where are all these poor creatures to be taken, doctor?" inquired the young earl, regarding the suffering crowd compassionately.

"To the military hospitals at Walworth, for the present, where I have orders to deliver them over to the surgeon in charge," replied the surgeon.

"Is Captain Douglas expected to go with them?"

"That will be at his own option. He is on sick leave. He can go to the hospital to be treated, if he pleases, or he can go anywhere else if he prefer," replied the surgeon.

"Oh, I shall be on leave also. After I have delivered over my charge, I shall be at liberty to go anywhere. I have scarcely thought yet where I shall go. My old home at Seton is standing still, but I am an old bachelor, without any particular attraction there more than elsewhere," said the surgeon, with a bitter-sweet smile.

"Then, doctor, I have a proposal to make to you, and I shall be very glad if it meet your views. I have nothing in this world to occupy me at present, and I think I cannot employ my leisure better than by devoting it to this brave young man, who has no near relative to look after him. I shall invite him to be my guest, and as I shall take charge of him. And if you [illegible] kindly [illegible] us with your company, we shall be very happy to have you. What do you say?" enquired Lord Wellrose.

"Thanks, my lord; but where do you propose to go?" asked the surgeon.

"I must take your advice upon that question. We have all Britain to choose from. And, of course, Captain Douglas' health must be our first consideration. What do you counsel?"

"My lord, I should certainly recommend the bracing air of the Highlands."

"He shall go to the Highlands, then. And I deem myself very fortunate in being able to offer him a home quieter and more comfortable than any hotel or lodging-house to be found in those regions. The family are at Cheviot Castle this season. And thus Seton Court is left in charge of the housekeeper and steward and a few old retainers, who will all be glad to see us. What do you say to the plan, doctor?"

"It is an excellent one."

"Then, as soon as we get back to my hotel, I will telegraph to the housekeeper to have the rooms aired and everything ready for us. Of course you will go with us. That is understood, I hope?"

"Yes, my lord; I shall be most happy."

"Right. You will also be near your old village home, which will be an advantage," added the earl.

And while he spoke, as the last of the sick and wounded had been brought on board, the tender dropped away from the side of the great ship, and steamed toward the shore.

As soon as she touched the pier the bustle of landing the invalided troops began. Many among them had friends who had come down to meet them. And their meeting added to the confusion.

The noise awoke Benny, who opened his eyes and looked wearily around, until his glance met the face of the earl, when he smiled radiantly.

Dr. Kinlock was very much engaged in superintending the landing of the invalids under his charge.

But Lord Wellrose himself went on shore and engaged a carriage, and had it drawn up as near as permissible to the steamer. And then he raised Benny, and supported him tenderly to the carriage, and placed him comfortably in it.

And Lord Wellrose, taking Benny's fair head upon his breast, gave the order to the coachman to drive slowly to the Lord Admiral.

On reaching that hotel, his lordship's groom and valet were found to be in attendance.

And, with their assistance, Captain Douglas was taken up to the rooms that had been engaged for his accommodation, and laid upon a comfortable lounge.

Lord Wellrose ordered a dainty luncheon, such as he hoped might tempt the invalid's delicate appetite. And then he came and sat by Benny's lounge, and took his wasted hand, and said:

"We will soon bring you around, my boy. English air and English fare will soon restore you."

"It is rest and peace—it is meat and drink only for me to lie here and look at you," said Benny, with a tone and glance of such pure love and perfect content that reached the young earl's heart.

By the earl's direction the waiter drew a table up by the side of the invalid's lounge, laid the cloth and arranged the luncheon upon it. There fresh oysters, fragrant soup, a roasted pheasant, some light, delicious wine, ripe peaches, apricots and grapes.

And then, because Lord Wellrose with his own hand served the invalid with the most choice of the viands spread before him, Benny tried to eat and found, to his surprise, that he really could do so, for appetite came with touch and taste and smell.

"And now try a little of this Moselle," said the earl. And although two waiters were there in attendance, with his own hand he filled Benny's glass and passed it to him, knowing that the wine would really do him more good when poured by a loved hand.

For these two unconscious brothers loved each other "with a love passing the love of woman."

Lord Wellrose did not leave him until night. And then he left him comfortably in bed, with his own valet, Perkins, to sleep in the room.

Lord Wellrose was engaged in looking over the evening paper, when Dr. Kinlock's card was brought to him.

He requested that the doctor should be shown up.

And in a few minutes Dr. Kinlock entered the room.

"I've got them off my hands at last, poor fellows, and heartily glad I am of it," said the surgeon, as at the earl's invitation he dropped into a chair.

The earl congratulated him. And then he reported Benny's condition, and inquired of the doctor what the chances might be for his restoration to health.

But the doctor was very reserved in giving his opinion. He said that young Douglas must always have been constitutionally very delicate, and that he would seem to have suffered, in his childhood from much neglect, privation and exposure, that had still further undermined his fragile health.

"I fear it has been so indeed," sighed the earl.

"You care very much for this young man, my lord," said the surgeon.

"I care so much for him that there is not another man on earth, except my father, that I prefer before him," said the earl, earnestly.

"You have known him long, my lord, I presume."

"I have known him since his childhood, though for many years I lost sight of him."

"And you do not know, I think you once said, exactly in what degree of relationship, if in any, he stands to your lordship?"

"I do not, indeed," said the earl, gazing upon the surgeon in surprise and questioning.

"Then, my lord, I fear I am going to startle your lordship very much. I have not yet let the secret pass my lips, even to him. But it is my painful duty to reveal it to your lordship. I wish you could—could spare me by anticipating it. But your lordship has no suspicion of the parentage of this young man?"

"None."

"Lord Wellrose, he is your own brother!"

Was Troubled for Years With Kidney Disease

And This Treatment Cured Me—This Statement Endorsed By a Baptist Minister.

The great majority of people are familiar with the extraordinary curative powers of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills. But for the benefit of those who are not we continue to publish from day to day reports from persons who have been actually cured.

MR. MOSHER.

The case described in this letter was an extreme one, and the writer was in a very low condition when he began the use of these pills. The cure was so marked that Mr. Mosher's pastor did not hesitate to vouch for his statement.

By their unique combined action on the liver, kidneys and bowels, Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills cure in complicated cases which defy the action of ordinary kidney medicines.

Mr. W. H. Mosher, Brockville, Ont., writes:—"I used Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills, and firmly believe there is no medicine to equal them. I was troubled for years with kidney disease, and this treatment has cured me. When I began the use of these pills I could only walk from my bed to a chair. Now I can go to the field and work like any other man. Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills are an excellent medicine."

This statement is certified to by the Rev. E. H. Emett, Baptist minister of Brockville, Ont.

By awakening the action of liver, kidneys and bowels Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills cure Constipation, Headaches, Chronic Indigestion, Kidney Disease, Liver Complaint and Backache. One pill a dose, 25 cents a box, all dealers, or Edmanson, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto.

A GOOD MOTTO.

(Guelph Mercury.)

A colored gentleman entered a store to buy a pair of blankets. He was interested in two pair, one at $4, the other at $6, and the dealer was pointing out the fine points of the better article. The purchaser replied that he had only $4, whereupon the salesman suggested that he could take the $6 pair and pay the difference later on. The reply of the colored man was this: "No, suh; I never hangs my hat higher up den I can reach."

Now, there's a whole sermon in the philosophy of that man, and you don't need any person to expound it, either. Extravagance is contagious, and the insane desire to "keep up with the neighbors" may have much to do with a lot of trouble, the blame for which is laid elsewhere.

If there is a sorry spectacle it is when the family with a $1,500 income tries to make as big a splash as the one next door that has $5,000 a year to come and go on.

The motto of the colored man is well worth remembering, and also practising. Never hang your hat higher than you can reach.

LENGTH OF LIFE INCREASES.

(Philadelphia Record)

In spite of the [illegible] of modern living and the tendency of men and women to gather in cities the statistics of mortality conclusively show that the average length of life is constantly increasing. A child of birth to-day may expect to live 10 years longer than if he or she had been born in 1800. If the present rate of improvement should continue for the next 200 years the average of life would be extended [illegible] years beyond the average of to-day. The main reason for latter-day longer living is the astonishing reduction in infant mortality which has been brought about by improved conditions.

NOTHING CAN EQUAL BABY'S OWN TABLETS

Mrs. Alex. Butchard, Conn., Ont., writes: "My daughter has used Baby's Own Tablets for her baby and thinks there is nothing to equal them for little ones. All mothers, who have used the Tablets, say the same thing. They break up colds, regulate the bowels and stomach and keep the little ones healthy and happy. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

A Peculiar Worm.

An animal growing between the high and low water marks on the Japanese coasts is a mud worm called sabella. It occupies a hard, limy tube of its own making and gets its food when the high tide comes up over its hiding place by thrusting out a head bushy with tentacles and sucking in currents of water loaded with minute particles of nutriment. Out of this wriggling creature the shore people make soup, which is true vermicelli, not a paste imitation of "little worms," and is said to taste as badly as it smells.

Waterproofing a Cloak.

Showers are often heavy in the summer. A heavy coat becomes a nuisance to carry about. If you have a thin favorite cloak you would like to make showerproof here is the method: Dissolve four ounces of alum in one gallon of rain water and four ounces of sugar of lead separately in another gallon, then mix, dip the material into this, well work it about, dry in the air, wash in cold water, dry finally, and there you are! Two dippings and two dryings will make it waterproof.

The Doctor.

The doctor comes smiling, and he holds my weary hand,
And he says I'll soon be better, and that soon he'll let me stand;
He promises the roses to my cheeks shall come again,
And he laughs away the fever and he jokes away the pain.

Through the long, long night I suffer, weird the dreams that come to me,
Quaint the thoughts that I am thinking; strange the sights that I can see,
But the sunbeams of the morning bring the doctor up the stairs
And the heart of me is lightened of a thousand different cares.

There is courage in the twinkle of his kindly smiling eyes,
And before his merry laughter fly a thousand fears and sighs;
And the thoughts that have been dreary change to pleasant ones and gay
When the good old kindly doctor smiles the doubts and dreads away.

For the doctor he comes singing and he sits beside my bed
And he lifts my weary spirits as the pillow lifts my head;
And the fever seems to leave me and the pains are not severe
And I'm better for his presence, and I'm stronger for his cheer.

The doctor is clever and certain of his skill,
And his people long have praised him for his work among the ill;
But it's not his wisdom only, that the life of us insures.
And it's not his pills and tonics, but the heart of him that cures.

DEFECTIVES.

(Toronto Star.)

Perhaps the first thing we need to get out of our heads is that the word "defectives" carries with it any reproach. Differences in physical or intellectual capacity are of no importance except that they are measures of responsibility for service. The duty of the strong is to serve the weak, and as far as possible remove the weakness. It should always be remembered that this service be not rendered in a patronizing way, but as the stronger member of the family keeps those who are not so well endowed.

THE BOY SCOUT MOVEMENT.

(Buffalo Courier)

The Boy Scout movement is not designed to foster militarism or cultivate an aggressive national spirit, but it does cultivate the value of discipline and the habit of self-control. Its mission is to teach self-helpfulness and helpfulness to others. It is calculated to influence boys to lead clean lives, and to have civic pride and a desire for clean government. Perhaps no greater agency for general good has ever been set in motion.

"Yes?"

"And after looking at it he said, 'Overworked.'"

Mr. Griffin heaved an audible sigh of relief. "I have perfect faith in that doctor, Mabel," he said, firmly. "You will have to give it a rest."

He Says He Told His Neighbors

AND THEY TOLD HIM TO TRY DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS.

Mike Rudy, Young Manitoba Farmer, Sick for Two Years, Tells How He Got a New Lease of Life.

Campervllle, Man., Feb. 22.—(Special)—Cured of Kidney and Heart Disease of two years standing, Mr. Mike Rudy, a well known young farmer living near here, is telling his neighbors that he owes his new lease of life to Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"For two years," Mr. Rudy states, "I suffered with a terrible pain in the small of my back and shoulders. I took many different medicines, and was under the doctor's care, but nothing seemed to do me any lasting good. Finally heart disease was added to my troubles.

"Hearing Dodd's Kidney Pills well spoken of by my neighbors, I decided to try them. To my surprise and relief one box cured me completely."

Dodd's Kidney Pills cured Mr. Rudy because his troubles all came from sick kidneys. Dodd's Kidney Pills are a kidney remedy, pure and simple. If you have pain in the back, rheumatism, lumbago, gravel or diabetes, your kidneys are wrong. You need Dodd's Kidney Pills.

THE FARMER'S PROBLEM.

(Toronto News)

The Canadian farmer has a difficult decision to make this year. For the first time in many years, from the standpoint of immediate profits, it will pay him to sell his coarse grains instead of feeding them to his live stock. The temptation is a dangerous one, but should not overcome the wise agriculturist, who is able to take the longer view. Consideration of ultimate profit demand that live stock should not be sacrificed. Were the short-sighted alternative generally to be taken the Canadian live stock industry would suffer a set-back from which it would not recover in 10 or even 20 years.

PAINT THE SCREW HOLES.

Then You Can Use Them Over and Over Again Without Trouble.

Many persons experience considerable difficulty in getting screws to hold in screen doors and other movable conveniences which are put up and taken down frequently and which are held in place by screws. The holes occupied by the screws become worn, and the screws are often quite loose, causing doors to sag and be otherwise out of proper order.

Bits of paper, string and small pieces of good are used to partially fill up the holes so as to cause the screws to be tight, but these work out and cause great annoyance, and a better method is greatly desired.

A coat of paint on the inside of the screw holes is the most satisfactory remedy for such an annoyance.

When screws are removed paint the holes with a small pencil brush or a bit of cloth twisted and dipped in the paint. When the paint fills the creases made by the thread of the screw and thoroughly dries the screw will fit tightly the next time it is thrust into the cavity. The painting should be done each time the screws are removed, and it will protect the wood as well as make the holes ready for the readjustment of the door or other object which had to the changed quite often.—Philadelphia North American.

FOR LABOR PEACE.

(Toronto Star)

The best thing that can happen in the interests of harmony and justice between capital and labor is for the real leaders of capital and the real leaders of labor to meet personally and talk over affairs. In such conferences it will be made evident that they have interests as well as conflicts. The great difficulty is that the leaders of labor can seldom actually meet the real owners of the money, invested in great corporate enterprises.

The publisher of the best Farmer's paper in the Maritime Provinces in writing to us states: "I would say that I do not know of a medicine that has stood the test of time like MINARD'S LINIMENT. It has been an unfailing remedy in our household ever since I can remember, and has outlived dozens of would-be competitors and imitators."

Opera Ways.

"I suppose you study your prima donnas and try to learn their whims?"

"No, we find it cheaper to understudy them."

Minard's Liniment Cures Distemper.

The time a man is most apt to repent is after he has been found out.

PITY AND PEACE

The [illegible] of [illegible] Lars and [illegible] [illegible] to all British peoples, but it is doubtful if the German people generally [illegible] [illegible]. It is [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] Prussian [illegible] the other [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The German people [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the people of Canada [illegible]. Herr Hirsch declared that the people did not [illegible] that the working [illegible], all the nation, [illegible] were [illegible] for peace. We believe [illegible] [illegible] in Hamilton, we hear on [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] this war [illegible]. But no one of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Allies at the need for a complete destruction of the German [illegible]. There is the general [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the German [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that the Kaiser [illegible]. [illegible] the horrors and savagery of this war as practised by the German soldiers it cannot be said that we hate the German people with an undying hatred.

Among the German Socialists, however, there is apparently a great longing for peace, for peace's sake. Herr Hirsch made no demand that Germany should continue the war until she was assured of [illegible]. He wants peace now if he can get it. Why? Evidently the Socialists have no love for or confidence in the Kaiser's Government, [illegible] [illegible] for the good or comfort of the German people. The Socialists oppose on principle the Government policy. They rebel against the restrictions of public speech—the strangling of the voice of the people. The Socialists want less interference by the police with the labor and Socialist movements, and they want a uniform franchise. The obtaining of these benefits to themselves were of more importance to the Socialists than the prosecution or the [illegible] of a successful war.

Germany is perhaps the most Socialistic country in the world. Her whole working class is permeated with Socialistic principles, which are antagonistic to the Kaiser's principle of divine right of kings and over lordship. In Germany these people are opposed to the party—the military party—who is carrying on this war. But when we come to look at the German-Americans, the men who came to the States to get away from this nightmare of militarism, we find them as rabid militarists as is the Kaiser. They are doing their very best to further the Kaiser's designs and evidently doing their best to get the United States entangled in the cruel strife. Take [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] gentlemen.

ARE BOTH EQUALLY BAD?

The Philadelphia Record, a newspaper whose editorial opinions we have come to respect and highly value, is somewhat out of tune with most of the other prominent United States newspapers with which we are conversant, on matters relating to the present world war. We have no desire to class it as a pro-German or to find fault with its views, [illegible] they are not favorable to Britain, but we cannot help feeling and believing that it is not always [illegible] and just to Great Britain. It appears to us as being anxious to defend Germany from what we consider just criticism. As an illustration let us quote what it says about Germany declaring British waters in the war zone. It says:

Advices from London express British wonder as to what the United States will say to the German pronouncement that the waters around Great Britain and Ireland and the whole English Channel be included in the war zone. What the United States will say or might say [illegible] [illegible] what might have been said with regard to the similar pronouncement of Great Britain several months ago declaring the North Sea to be in the zone of war and closed to neutral shipping. Either pronouncement is of a character such as one might expect from a pack of buccaneers rather than from the Governments of civilized nations. If there is any difference in degree of reprehensibility between them, the German pronouncement is a trifle less lawless than the British. The former is to be backed up by a blockade, probably, of submarine patrol ships; the latter was backed up by an implied threat of mines and British high-handedness.

Our contemporary cannot forget that at the very opening of the war Germany began to sow floating mines in the open sea, which imperilled not only the safety of British but of neutral trading vessels, and not a few of the latter with their crews were lost. For some time Britain refused to sow even stable mines. With a view to putting a stop to the Germans sowing more of these mines, many of which were cast into the sea from German ships under a neutral flag, Britain proclaimed a portion of the North Sea, not the whole of it, as in the zone of war. By doing this she did not imperil neutral ships or threaten them. She made the sea safe for them, as she kept [illegible] [illegible] for them and guided them [illegible] [illegible] German mines.

Britain has not sunk any [illegible] neutral merchant vessels. She has not sent any merchant crews to the bottom of the sea. She does not even prevent U. S. vessels from trading with the enemy, although she could easily blockade all Germany's ports. All she asks is that they will not carry contraband to the Germans. By her control of the sea she has made it possible for the States to carry on the most of their ordinary ocean commerce. We hardly think that these [illegible] [illegible] that the German pronouncement is a trifle less lawless than the British."

[illegible] [illegible] is another danger [illegible] [illegible].

* * *

[illegible] production is another [illegible] for [illegible].

* * *

Will Germany's paper blockade be [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible] bill?

* * *

Dear, dear! The Kaiser is now using poisoned shells and bullets in his fight against the allies.

* * *

But the allies could starve Germany [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Germany [illegible] [illegible] at that game.

* * *

* * *

It is said that eight hundred Serbian farmers must have tools and seed next spring or starve. Help is urgently asked.

* * *

Returns brought down show that the Government has appointed a whole army of tax eaters since it came into power.

* * *

The horrors of Kingston Penitentiary are said to be something awful. Yet the Government looks placidly on and does nothing.

* * *

It is now an offence apparently to speak English in Germany, yet plenty of German is spoken in Canada and nobody complains.

* * *

Van Horn has been treated as an ordinary criminal in Vanceboro for breaking windows. The political refugee business did not work.

* * *

Three innocent men were hanged in Canada last year, according to Mr. Robert Bickerdike, a Montreal M.P. He says he can prove his statement.

* * *

President Wilson is right when he tells the British Government that the continued use of the Stars and Stripes on British vessels would endanger real neutral vessels.

* * *

The Canadian rural routes are increasing. The last fiscal year they increased by 940, or nearly fifty per cent. For this convenience the farmers have to thank the Liberal party.

* * *

Three-quarters of the men offering themselves in Montreal for service in the European war zone are being rejected as not up to the standard required. Are none wanted but hand-picked giants?

* * *

German and Russian women are [illegible] found fighting in the trenches and British women are training to [illegible] the invaders. The Suffragettes [illegible] [illegible] point with pride to these daughters of the regiment.

* * *

The Buffalo News makes a pardonable mistake when it credits Sir Edward Grey with making some remarks at a London meeting as to the duty of neutrals in this war. The speaker on the occasion was Earl Grey, former Governor-General of Canada, and now out of office. Sir Edward, as Foreign Secretary, is not making many speeches these days.

We are now told by a Tory contemporary that Mr. N. W. Rowell, the Ontario Liberal leader, is to go to Ottawa as successor to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, [illegible] all the Ottawa Liberals have been [illegible] and found wanting. Well, there need be no hurry. Sir Wilfrid [illegible] [illegible] a dozen dead men and he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] be Premier of Canada [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Rowell could [illegible] the bill if he were needed.

The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with what authority we do not know, that Lord Kitchener will go to the front next [illegible], taking supreme command, with [illegible] in charge of the infantry and artillery [illegible] while Gen. French will take command of the cavalry. If Kitchener think that his work is done in raising [illegible] at home, we would not be surprised to see him as commander-in-chief of the British forces. No doubt he is chafing now to have a hand in the fight.

If You Wish to Be Well You Must Keep the Bowels Regular.

If the bowels do not move regularly they will, sooner or later, become constipated, and constipation is productive of more ill health than almost any other trouble.

The [illegible] cause of constipation is an inactive liver, and unless the liver is kept active you may rest assured that headaches, jaundice, heartburn, piles, [illegible] specks before the eyes, a feeling as if you were going to faint, or catarrh of the stomach will follow the wrong action of this, one of the most important organs of the body.

Keep the liver active and working properly by the use of Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills.

Mrs. [illegible] [illegible] Ayer, Fawcett Hill, N.B., writes: "I was troubled with constipation for many years and about three years ago my husband wanted me to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, as they had cured him. I got a vial and took them, and by the time I had taken three vials I was cured. I always keep them on hand, and when I need a mild laxative I take one."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

A Public Idol

He could put words to it now. It had been nothing [illegible] than a settled foresight, a deep conviction, of Isabel Bretherton's failure! What a treachery! But yes, the vision perpetually before his eyes had been the vision of a dying fame, a waning celebrity, a forsaken and disowned beauty! And from that abandonment and that failure he had dimly foreseen the rise and upspringing of new and indescribable joy. He had seen her, conscious of defeat and of the inexorable limits of her own personality, turning to the man who had read her truly and yet had loved her, surely, from the very beginning, and finding in his love a fresh glory and an all sufficient consolation. This had been the inmost truth, the centre, the kernel of all his thought, of all his life. He saw it now with sharp distinctness, now that every perception was intensified by pain and longing.

Then, as he went over the past, he saw how this consciousness had been gradually invaded and broken up by his sister's letters. He remembered the incredulous impatience with which he had read the earlier ones. So, Marie thought him mistaken! "Isabel Bretherton would be an actress yet" "she had genius, after all" "she was learning, growing, developing every day." Absurd! He had been able to keep his critical estimate of the actress, and his personal admiration of the woman separate from one another. But evidently Marie's head had been confused, misled by her heart. And then, little by little, his incredulity had yielded and his point of view had changed. Instead of impatience at Marie's laxity of judgment, what he had been fiercely conscious of for days was jealousy of Paul de Chateauvieux, jealousy of his opportunities, his influence, his relation toward that one of his dreams of the future—the dream of tutoring and training her young, unformed intelligence. He had done something toward it; he had, as it were, touched the spring which had set free all this new and unexpected store of power. But, if he had planted, others had watered, and others would reap. In this great [illegible] of her fortunes he had been nothing to her. Other voices and other hands had guided and directed her. Her kindly, grateful message only stung and tortured him. They seemed to him the merest friendly commonplace. In reality her life had passed out of his ken; her nature had flowered into a new perfection, and he had not been there to see or to help. She would never connect him with the incidents or the influences which had transformed existence to her, and would probably irrevocably change the whole outline of her future. Once he had wounded and startled her, and had despaired for awhile of undoing the impression made upon her. But now he felt no quick anxiety, no fear how things might turn, only a settled flat consciousness of division, of a life that had once been near to his swept away from him forever, or diverging roads which no kindly fate would ever join again.

For, by the end of this time of solitary waiting, his change of attitude was complete. It was evident to him that his anticipation of her failure, potent as it had been over his life, had never been half so real, half so vivid, as this new and strange foreboding of her true success. Marie must be right. He had been a mere blind hair-splitting pedant, judging Isabel Bretherton by principles and standards which left out of count the inborn energy, the natural power of growth, of such a personality as hers. And the more he had once doubted the more he now believed. Yes, she would be great—she would make her way into that city of the mind in which he himself had made his dwelling-place; she, too, would enter upon the world's vast inheritance of knowledge. She would become, if only her physical frame proved equal to the demands upon it, one of that little band of interpreters, of ministers of the idea, by whom the intellectual life of a society is fed and quickened. Was he so lost in his own selfish covetousness as not to rejoice?

Oh, but she was a woman, she was beautiful, and he loved her! Do what he would, all ideal and impersonal considerations fell utterly away from him. Day by day he knew more of his own heart; day by day the philosopher grew weaker in him, and the man's claim fiercer. Before him perpetually were two figures of a most human and practical reality. He saw a great actress absorbed in the excitement of the most stimulating of lives, her power thening from year to year, her fame growing and widening with time; and beside this brilliant vision he saw himself, the quiet man of letters, with the enthusiasm of youth behind him, the cares of middle age before him. What possible link could there be between them?

At last Wallace's letter cleared still further the issues of the conflict; or, rather, it led to Kendal's seeking a fatalist compact with himself. He was weary of the struggle, and it seemed to him that he must somehow or other escape from the grip in which his life was held. He must somehow deaden this sense, this bitter sense of loss, if it were only by postponing the last renunciation. He would go back to his work and force himself not to hate it. It was his only refuge, and he must cling to it for dear life. And he would not see her again till the night of the first performance of "Elvira." She would be in London in a month's time, but he would take care to be out of reach. He would not meet those glorious eyes or touch that hand again till the die was cast—upon the fate of Elvira he staked his own. The decision brought him a strange kind of peace, and he went back to his papers and his books like a man who has escaped from the grasp of some deadly physical ill into a period of comparative ease and relief.

CHAPTER VII.

It was a rainy November night. A soft, continuous downpour was soaking the London streets, without, however, affecting their animation or the nocturnal brightness of the capital, for the brilliance of the gas lamps was flashed back from innumerable patches of water, and every ray of light seemed to be broken by the rain into a hundred shimmering reflections. It was the hour when all the royalty an [illegible] London can boast is in the streets, hurrying to its dinner or its amusements, and when the stream of diners-out, flowing through the different channels of the West, is met at all the great thoroughfares by the stream of theatre-goers setting eastward.

The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] eastward, and [illegible] [illegible] the entrance to a certain narrow street leading northward from it, in which stood the new large buildings of the Calliope. Outside the theatre [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of carriages and human beings only kept in order by the [illegible] of the police, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The line of carriages [illegible] interminable, and [illegible] those who [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the drapery curtains [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] was full of the [illegible] [illegible] the whole crowd had a [illegible] almost a family air, [illegible] though the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] had been [illegible] into the theatre. Everybody seemed to know everybody else; there were politicians and artists and writers of books, known and unknown. There were fair women and [illegible] [illegible] and great ladies, and there was that large substratum of faithful, but comparatively nameless, persons on whom a successful manager learns to depend with some confidence on that first night of importance.

And this was a first night of exceptional interest. [illegible] [illegible] indeed, had been the competition for tickets that many of those present feel as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] an idea of how [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] which has overthrown his neighbor. Miss Bretherton's first appearance in "Elvira" had been the subject of conversation for weeks past among a far larger number of London circles than generally concern themselves with theatrical affairs. Among those which might be said to be within a certain literary and artistic circumference people were able to give definite grounds for the public interest. The play, it was said, was an admirable good one and the progress of the rehearsals had led [illegible] a flow of rumors to the effect that Miss Bretherton's acting would be a great surprise to the public. Further, from the intellectual centre of things it [illegible] known that the famous [illegible] [illegible] returned to the scene of his triumphs, and that now, as in the [illegible], one of the first articles of the social [illegible] laid it down as necessary that you should, first of all, see her in the theatre, and secondly, know her—by fair means, if possible, if not, by crooked ones—in society.

It was nearly a quarter to eight. The orchestra had taken their places and almost every seat was full. In one of the dress-circle boxes sat three people who had arrived early, and had for some time employed themselves in making a study [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] stream through their opera glasses. They were Eustace Kendal, his sister, Madame de Chateauvieux, and her husband. The Chateauvieux had traveled over from Paris expressly on the occasion, and Madame de Chateauvieux's gray-blue eyes sparkling with expectation and all her small delicate features alive with interest and animation was watching for the rising of the heavy velvet curtain with an eagerness which brought down upon her the occasional mockery of her husband, who was in reality, however, [illegible] less excited than herself. It was but three weeks since they had parted with Isabel Bretherton in Paris and they were feeling on this first night something of the anxiety and responsibility which parents feel when they [illegible] a child [illegible] whom they have [illegible] their best effort into a real world.

Victor Eustace, [illegible] [illegible] had but that afternoon arrived in London. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] relations in the north, and had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] accordance with the claim which had [illegible] [illegible] of him in [illegible]. [illegible] he had [illegible] all the preparations for "Elvira" and he had arrived up to the scene only at the moment when the first coup was to be delivered. Miss Bretherton had herself [illegible] him a warm note of invitation, [illegible] [illegible] for the first night and an appeal to him to come and [illegible] [illegible] as kindly as truth will let [illegible]. [illegible] had answered her that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he would be in his place at the Calliope on the night of [illegible] of November.

And [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] all the time conscious [illegible] that to him alone of all the [illegible] in that vast theatre, the [illegible] of the evening would be so vitally and desperately important, that life on the other side of it would bear the mark of it forever. It was a burden to him that his sister suspected nothing of his state of feeling; it would have consoled him that she should know it, but it seemed to him impossible to tell her.

"There are the Stuarts," he said, bending down to her as the orchestra struck up, "in the box to the left. [illegible] [illegible] will join them when it begins. [illegible] [illegible] told [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for this play. Every detail in it, they say, is perfect, artistically and historically, and the time of preparation has been exceptionally [illegible]. Why did she refuse to begin again with the 'White Lady' to give herself more time?"

"I cannot tell you, except that she had a repugnance to it which could not be got over. I believe her associations with the play were so painful that it would have seemed an evil omen to her to begin a new season with it."

"Was she wise, I wonder?"

"I think she did well to follow her [illegible] in the matter, and she herself has had plenty of time. She was working at it all the week [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] and young Harding, [illegible]. I think and notice enough. Some of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] plots, but they will [illegible] [illegible] into place."

"Poor Wallace," said Kendal, "he must be wishing it well over. I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] better [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]."

"How [illegible] is," cried Madame de Chateauvieux, breaking for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in his [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] Wallace, how does he and how go things doing?"

Poor Wallace threw himself into his seat, flicking the picture of misery so far as his face which Nature had troubled in [illegible] [illegible] cheerfullest [illegible], was capable of it.

"Ah, dear Madame de Chateauvieux, I have no more notion than the man in the moon. Miss Bretherton is an [illegible] and [illegible]. [illegible] we should have collapsed a hundred times already, and that's about all I know. As for the other people, I suppose they will [illegible] through their parts somehow, but at present I feel like a man [illegible] [illegible] of the gallows. There goes the bell—now for it!"

The sketch for the play of "Elvira" had been found among the papers of a young [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] German career, during those stormy years after 1830, when [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] every [illegible] and the romantic passion was abroad. The sketch had appeared in a little [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which Edward Wallace had picked up by chance on [illegible] [illegible]. He had read it in an idle hour in a railway, had seen its capabilities, and had forthwith set to work to develop the sketch into a play. [illegible] in developing it he had carefully preserved the character of the original conception. It was a [illegible] [illegible] of the Romantic time, and the execution of it presented [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of tone [illegible] modern audiences have learned to expect. The play told one rapid, [illegible] story of love, jealousy, despair and death, and told it directly and uninterruptedly, without any lighter interlude. Author and adapter alike had trusted entirely to the tragic force of the situation, and the universality of the motives appealed to. The diction of the piece was the diction of Alfred de Vigny or of the school of Victor Hugo. It was, indeed, rather a dramatic love-poem than a play in the modern sense, and it depended altogether for its success upon the two characters of Macias and Elvira.

In devising the character of Macias the Italian author had made use of a traditional Spanish type, which has its historical sources and has inspired [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] from the fifteenth century downward. Macias—a knight, poet and lover, his love a kind of Southern madness which [illegible] every other thing in its neighborhood and his tragic death is the only natural thing to a career so fierce and uncontrolled. Elvira, with whom Macias is in love, the daughter of Nuno Fernandez, is embodied gentleness and virtue, until the fierce [illegible] of her fate has taught her that men are treacherous and the world cruel. For her love had been [illegible] and smooth until by a series of events it had been brought into antagonism with two opposing interests—those of her father and of a certain Fernan Perez, the tool and favorite of the powerful Duke of Villena. The ambition and selfish passion of these two men are enlisted against her. Perez is determined to marry her; her father is determined to remove Macias out of the path of his own political advancement. The intrigue devised between the two is perfectly successful. Macias is enticed away, Elvira forced to believe that she is deserted and betrayed, is half driven, half entrapped into a marriage with Perez, and Macias, returning to claim her against a hundred obstacles, meets the wedding [illegible] on its way back to the palace of the duke.

The [illegible] of the play [illegible] of [illegible] the struggle between the conflicting forces. Gods devoted [illegible] [illegible] and mechanism the story was [illegible] a common romantic type [illegible] [illegible] no worse than hundreds of others of which the literary [illegible] of the first half of the present century are full. It required all the aid that the literary treatment could give it to raise it above the level of other melodramas and turn it into tragedy. But fortune had been kind to it; the subject had been already handled in the Italian sketch with delicacy and a true tragic insight, and Edward Wallace had brought all the resources of a very [illegible] [illegible] and critical [illegible] to bear upon his task. It could hardly have been foreseen that he would be attracted by the subject, but once at work upon it he had worked with enthusiasm.

The curtain rose on the great hall of the Villena Palace. Everything that antiquarian knowledge could do had been brought to bear upon the surroundings of the scene, the delicate tile work of the walls and floor, the leather hangings, the tapestries, the carved wood and brass work of a Spanish palace of the fifteenth century, had been copied with lavish magnificence, and the crowded expectant house divided its attention and applause during the first scene between the beauty and elaboration of its setting, and the play of the two [illegible] actors who represented Elvira's father and the rival of Macias, Fernan Perez.

Fernan Perez, having [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which is to wreck the love of Macias and Elvira, had just risen from his seat, when Wallace, who was watching the stage in a torment of mingled satisfaction and despair, touched Madame de Chateauvieux's arm.

"Now!" he said. "That door to the left."

Kendal, catching the signal, rose from his seat behind Madame de Chateauvieux and bent forward. The great door at the end of the palace had slowly opened, and gliding through it with drooping head and hands clasped before her came Elvira, followed by her little maid Beatriz. The storm which greeted her appearance was such as thrilled the pulses of the oldest habitue in the theatre. Tears came to Madame de Chateauvieux's eyes, as she looked up at her brother.

"What a scene! It is overpowering—it is too much for her! I wish they would let her go on!"

Kendal made her no answer, his soul was in his eyes; he had no senses for any but one person. She was there, within a few yards of him, in all the sovereignty of her beauty and her fame, invested with the utmost romance that circumstances could bestow, and about, if half he heard were true, to reap a great artistic and no less than a great personal triumph. Had he felt toward her only as the public felt it would have been an experience beyond the common [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], this aching, [illegible] sense of desire, of separation, of irretrievable need! Was that her voice? He had heard that tone [illegible] in it before—under [illegible] woods, when the June [illegible] was in the air. That white outstretched hand had once lain [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] those eyes had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON IX.

Samuel, the Victorious Leader. 1 Samuel 7, 5-17.

Commentary.—I. Preparation (vs. 3-6). 3. Samuel—He had been judge of Israel from the death of Eli. He was preparing the people for the reformation that was about to be accomplished. "When the right moment came and the desire for better things sprang up as the fruit of his prophetic labors, he was ready to take his place as the leader of the nation."—Cam. Bib. Spake unto all the house of Israel—The influence of Samuel's piety and efforts extended to the various tribes of Israel. Most of the judges exerted an influence over a few tribes, but Samuel gained a hold upon the whole nation. Put away the foreign gods (R. V.)—There was a disposition on the part of Israel to return to the God of Israel, and this purpose was to be manifested by giving up the gods of the heathen. Prepare your hearts unto the Lord—"Direct your hearts unto Jehovah."—R. V. They were not only to forsake all other deities, but they were to seek and serve the true God and Him only. He will deliver you—The declaration is definite and positive. If Israel would meet the conditions, they would be saved from the oppression of the Philistines, under which they had suffered for forty years. 4. Did put away Baalim and Ashtaroth—It was a long step in advance when the people of Israel put away foreign gods. They were on the way to victory. Baalim is the plural of Baal and Ashtaroth is the plural of Ashtoreth.

5. Gather all Israel to Mizpeh—Mizpeh denotes a watch-tower. It is thought it was about five miles northwest of Jerusalem, but there is a difference of opinion as to its location. Some would place it at Scopus, a hill a mile northeast of Jerusalem. This assembly of the people was for the purpose of getting ready to throw off the Philistine yoke. Samuel would pray for Israel as they were thus gathered. 6. Drew water, and poured it out—This act indicated penitence. It also may have had the force of a pledge to God on the part of the people to serve Him. Fasted—In token of their contrition and determination. We have sinned against the Lord—The people publicly confessed their sins and thus humbled themselves before the Lord. They turned from strange gods, turned toward the Lord, repented, and confessed their sins. Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh—He declared to the people the course they must take to secure the divine favor and obtain liberty from the Philistine oppression. It is probable that he acted also as a civil magistrate. 7. Philistines heard, etc.—They supposed that the gathering together of the Israelites was a warlike movement. They had gathered to humble themselves before the Lord and seek His help, and naturally the next step would be to make preparations to gain the victory over their oppressors. Lords of the Philistines—The leaders of the nation. Went up against Israel—They hastened to put down any insurrection that might be planned by Israel. Were afraid of the Philistines—The Israelites had experienced in the past to their sorrow the strength of their enemy. 8. Cease not to cry unto the Lord—In their fear and distress, since they had humbled themselves before the Lord, they saw that their only safety was in getting help from God.

II. Victory (vs. 9-14). 9. A burnt offering wholly unto the Lord—The "sucking lamb" must have been at least seven days old (Lev. 22: 27), and was offered whole, that is, it was not divided. "The whole animal was burned upon the altar to denote the entire consecration to Jehovah of those who were pleading for deliverance."—Cam. Bib. Samuel cried unto the Lord—The work he had been doing for Israel for years was proving effective. The nation had reached a stage of reformation where their prayers would be heard. Samuel prayed in faith, and, "the Lord heard him." 10. Drew near to battle—In the midst of the religious ceremony the Philistines advanced to attack Israel, who were unorganized and unprepared for battle. From a human standpoint the advantage was wholly on the side of the Philistines. The Lord thundered with a great thunder—The language is forceful. It gives prominency to the divine agency. It declares the great violence of the storm, which threw the Philistine army into confusion. "This amazing miracle was wrought in answer to Samuel's prayer, and was a confirmation of his words to Israel as recorded in verse 3."—Whedon. Smitten before Israel—Heretofore Israel had been smitten before the Philistines. 11. Pursued the Philistines—They followed up the advantage the Lord gave them. Under Beth-car—The exact location is unknown, but must have been west or southwest of Mizpeh towards the Philistine's country. 12. Called the name of it Eben-ezer—Samuel would commemorate the victory and at the same time ascribe the glory to God.

13. The Lord was against the Philistines—The oppression of forty years was at an end, and the Lord kept the Philistines from making inroads into Israel's territory. 14. Cities . . . were restored—Samuel's administration was a vigorous one. He succeeded in breaking the enemy's power in those cities which had been wrested from Israel. From Ekron even unto Gath—The cities between the two places named were restored to Israel. Ekron and Gath remained in the hands of the Philistines. Amorites—Not only did the Lord give deliverance to Israel from the Philistines, but He gave them rest from the Amorites, Israel's most powerful enemy, next to the Philistines. They were the inhabitants of the highlands of Judah and Ephraim.

III. A noble life (vs. 15-17). 15. Samuel judged Israel—He was a prophet as well as a judge. The Lord spake to to him and he delivered the messages to those for whom they were given. He was regarded with reverence by the people. As a judge he was far-seeing and impartial. As a man of God he had great power in prayer. He accomplished for the people of Israel that for which he was raised up. All the days of his life—In his old age Samuel made his sons judges, but they were only his assistants, while he retained his judicial office. Saul was made king while Samuel lived, but Samuel continued to execute his office to a considerable extent. 16. Bethel—About eight miles north of Jerusalem. Gilgal—East of Jericho. Samuel passed from place to place and thus gave the people opportunity to bring their cases before him. 17. Ramah—A city a few miles north of Jerusalem.

Questions.—What exhortation did Samuel give to Israel? What reform took place in Israel? How did the Israelites show their return to the Lord? Where did they assemble and for what purpose? Why did the Philistines come up? How did the Lord put the Philistines to confusion? How did Samuel commemorate the victory of Israel? What was the effect of this victory?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Israel's return to God.

I. Embraced true religious reform.

II. Established national unity.

I. Embraced true religious reform. When the time came to utter the word of the Lord in the full maturity of His powers and to take the leadership of the nation, Samuel stood ready. Penetrating to the deepest source of their defeat, Samuel placed the recognition of Jehovah at the basis of all national reform. He addressed all the tribes with a voice of moral authority that recalled the admonitions of Moses and the last words of Joshua. Samuel had force of will to resist the tide of evil and to bid it recede. He distinctly charged the house of Israel with having gone astray from the living God. Their idolatry was not a mere fancy nor a mere selfish indulgence. It was an insult, a dishonor to their God. Therefore Samuel's first great act as prophet-judge was to call the people to a thorough religious and moral cleansing, embracing purity of heart, temperance in spirit, chastity of body and righteousness one toward another. The steps leading to this must be a hearty renunciation of all idols, the confession of sin in humiliation of spirit and by special prayer. Renunciation of sin combined with positive acts of obedience was the order of things. Upon their sincere repentance a new order began. National repentance was followed by a national assembly. A most important part of the prophetic office was to maintain the spiritual character of the Hebrew worship, and to prevent degeneracy of the people into ritualism. Israel's experience of defeat and oppression had taught them their own weakness and cured their presumption. Their urgent request of Samuel for prayer in their behalf was an evidence of their reliance on Jehovah. Where Israel experienced an overwhelming defeat twenty years before, they now gained a signal victory and were restored from apostasy. This victory was achieved at the throne of grace by Samuel's intercession. He was the means of Israel's help. As soon as the lamb was slain the blessing began to descend upon Israel and the curse upon their foes. Under Samuel, without the ark or any symbol of the divine presence, Israel's enemies were destroyed and the penitent people delivered. Twenty years before on that field Israel was defeated. There Hophni and Phinehas, Eli's wicked sons, were slain.

II. Established national unity. Samuel was first a prophet, then a faithful priest and finally a ruler and judge. He officiated as priest and ruled as judge. His policy was one of peace. Idolatry was banished. The principles of the theocracy were confirmed. Order, justice and peace were established. Closer unity prevailed among the tribes of Israel, so that they again became a nation. In Israel every revival of religion was succeeded by national prosperity and political independence. The power of the enemy was broken. The Lord was their defense. Lost territory was restored. Far-reaching peace was established. Samuel's protracted labor was an evidence of his public spirit. It was the principal means of raising the nation to its subsequent power and glory. Samuel led the people through two revolutions, one religious and the other political. He closely associated the throne with the altar, earthly power with piety, the good of the country with the glory of God. He connected the official with the personal so intimately that he could not be a godly man without also being an upright judge. Under his government piety flourished, the stream of justice ran pure, the rights of all classes were respected, private property was safe and the public burdens were borne by a prosperous people. Samuel was a judge who built up a kingdom of righteousness. He knew the need of establishing order and discipline under the sacred law. His residence was conspicuously a centre of religious influence. There the altar proclaimed to the tribes of Israel that piety was to be the character and the will of God the rule of his government. Samuel ruled by virtue of what he was in himself and he had the ability because of his early training and continuous growth of character. Through him an orderly and beneficial civil administration, diligently maintained on religious principles, was enjoyed by the various tribes of Israel.

THE WEAK SPOT IN THE BACK.

When the kidneys get ill the back gives out.

But the back is not to blame.

Therefore, dull pain in the back, or sharp, quick twinges are warnings of sick kidneys—warning of kidney trouble.

Plasters and liniments will not cure a bad back, for they cannot reach the kidneys which cause it.

Doan's Kidney Pills reach the kidneys themselves. They are a special kidney and bladder medicine. They heal the diseased surface of kidneys and bladder, and help them to act freely and naturally.

Mr. Chester Ramsay, Fort Coulonge, Que., writes: "I had been troubled with sore back for over four years, and could get nothing to do me any good until I heard of your Doan's Kidney Pills. I got three boxes and took them and now I am completely cured."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c a box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

PATRIOTISM and PRODUCTION

Complete Your Plans Now

The important thing now is to complete at once your plan for the year's work—for increased production. By planning well in advance, each month's operations can be carried through more effectively when the time comes. Delays later on, through neglect of this, will mean loss to you and to the Empire.

Use the Best Seed

This year, for the sake of the Empire, farmers should be exceptionally careful in the selection of seed. Cheap seed is often the dearest. If every Canadian farmer would use only the best varieties, and sow on properly cultivated soil, the grain output of Canadian farms would be doubled. Deal only with reliable seedsmen. Write at once to Canadian Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, and to your Provincial Agricultural Department for information as to the best varieties of seed to be used in your particular locality, and use no others.

ATTEND YOUR CONFERENCE

Clean Your Seed

All grain intended for seed should be thoroughly cleaned and selected to retain only the strong kernels. You can reap only what you sow. It does not pay to sow weeds. Clean seed means larger crops and helps to keep the land clean. When you have your seed grain ready, put it through the cleaner once more.

Test Your Seed

Test your seed for vitality, too. Seed is not always as good as it looks. For example, oats, quite normal in appearance and weight, may be so badly damaged by frost that their value for seed is completely destroyed. If you have any doubt as to the quality of your seed a sample may be sent free to the seed laboratory at Ottawa, or Calgary, for test. But in most cases this simple test will prove sufficient:—

Take a saucer and two pieces of blotting paper. Place seed between blotting papers. Keep moist and in a warm place. In a few days, you will be able to see whether the vitality is there. Neglect to test your seed may mean the loss of crop.

The Farm Labour Problem

The Government suggests the forming of an active committee in every town and city, composed of town and country men and women. This committee would find out the sort of help the farmers of their locality need, and get a list of the unemployed in their town or city, who are suitable for farm labour. With this information, the committee would be in a good position to get the right man for the right place.

Councils, both rural and urban, Boards of Trade and other organizations could advantageously finance such work. Every unemployed man in the town or city who is placed on the farm becomes immediately a producer, instead of a mere consumer and a civic expense.

Increase Your Live Stock

Breeding stock are today Canada's most valuable asset. The one outstanding feature of the world's farming is that there will soon be a great shortage of meat supplies. Save your breeding stock. Plan to increase your live stock. Europe and the United States as well as Canada will pay higher prices for beef, mutton and bacon in the very near future. Do not sacrifice now. Remember that live stock is the only basis for prosperous agriculture. You are farming not speculating.

LETTER FROM PARIS.

Zouaves, Turcos, and other French colonial troops in their bright colored and picturesque uniforms, the whole forming one of those bewildering scenes which a year ago would have seemed impossible to bring about, and which goes such a long way to show the heavy strain and vast effort put forth by the Allies in order to make the lives of the rising generation free from the weight which has rested upon Europe almost ever since 1870.

Another notable feature of the great change above referred to, is that which concerns the wives and daughters of the men who have gone to the front. It is an everyday occurrence to see in the suburban trains women of all grades of society knitting socks, mittens, etc., for relatives, a number of these busy workers wearing garments of mourning which tell too vividly the tale of hardship, suffering and sacrifice, which is daily taking place within a few hours of Paris.

And England what does she appear to be doing, she and her colonies and dependencies? One has only to go to such places as Orleans, Havre, Nantes, Le Mans and other concentration points to meet on all sides stalwart Englishmen of the regular army as well as swarthy Indians from India, the latter mostly in Orleans, to become aware that France is not alone in her giant struggle against the hordes of "Boches" as the Germans are called here. We have seen all these troops and could not fail to be impressed with what it means to have them all in France on their present errand. Let the people at home be proud to form part of the great British Empire, at the present time above all others, and thus to have the opportunity of standing shoulder to shoulder with Great Britain in the present struggle. To see the spirit in which English, French, Belgian and French colonial troops go through Paris on their way to the front is enough to make anyone certain as to the final result of this great struggle.

Apologizing for taking up so much of your valuable space but believing that these few impressions will interest your readers, I remain

Yours very truly,
A. Rabbens.

Application To Parliament.

Notice is hereby given that an application will be made by the Corporation of the town of Walkerton to the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario at the next ensuing session thereof for an act to consolidate the outstanding debenture and other indebtedness of the said town at the rate of $41,000, and authorizing and empowering the Corporation to raise by way of loan the said sum of $41,000 on the credit of its debentures to be issued under the authority of the said act.

That the said debentures shall be payable within thirty years after the issue thereof and shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent per annum as the said council shall determine. The existing debenture debt of the said town of Walkerton is as follows and no portion thereof is in arrears:—

Former consolidated debt	$ 1675 79
Sewers	4907 14
Waterworks	13796 98
General improvement	7510 29
Bonus loans	1896 38
Public Library	1642 10
Floating debt	1821 39
	$41000 00

The reason for requiring the consolidation of the said debenture debt and for the issue of such debentures is to enable a reduction to be made in the sums to be raised annually for the repayment of the said debt and to enable the Corporation to pay off its floating indebtedness, which was incurred in executing works of a permanent and necessary character.

DOGS KILLED.

Recently we heard a citizen state that he had witnessed a gathering of thirteen dogs at a street intersection in town. Canine population seems to have been at high-water mark this winter, but as the assessor will soon be on his annual rounds a fair proportion of the dog army may be reported among the dead and missing, and therefore untaxable. Three real fatalities occurred last week, however. On Friday two were killed on the railway bridge over the Teeswater. These were hounds belonging to Messrs. W. J. Ellis and Jos. A. McNeil. The animals were crossing the bridge, and were struck by the freight train. Mr. H. Irwin brought a coach dog home with him from Walkerton, and tied it in the stable. A short time after spotty was found dead at the end of the rope, having jumped out of the manger and the rope was too short to allow him to reach the floor.—Paisley Advocate.

CHEPSTOW

It is our sad duty this week to chronicle the death of the infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs Jos. Felmer. The remains were interred in the R. C. cemetery on Tuesday morning at nine o'clock. The sympathy of the community is extended to Mr. and Mrs. Felmer in their hour of sorrow.

Mr. Jas. M. Graf has finished his contract of cutting ice for the farmers.

Mr. Richard Powers of Portland Ore. is home on an extended visit to friends and relatives here. This is the first visit Mr. Powers has made to his home since leaving here about fifteen years ago.

Mr. Greg Sharbrech made a business trip to Walkerton on Monday.

Our miller, Mr. Thos F. Mullin is getting in a good supply of cedar logs which he will manufacture into shingles. The mild weather the last week or so has raised the supply of water consequently Mr. Mullin has all kinds of power at his disposal. Farmers would do well to rush their grain in while the sleighing lasts.

Miss Agnes Hogan left on Monday for Owen Sound where she will spend a few weeks visiting with her sister, Mrs. Cassidy.

Messrs Clancy and Kerwin of Cargill spent Sunday evening in the burg.

Miss Susan Kloepher of Walkerton is here on a visit to parents and relatives.

Some of our farmers were tempted to dispose of their surplus wheat a couple of weeks ago when the fancy price of $1 60 per bushel was obtained by some. They claim it pays to grow wheat at that price.

Mr. Thos. J. Lacy was a business visitor in the county town on Saturday.

Our enterprising local wagon-maker Mr. Joseph Hunziger received a shipment of four splashy new buggies for the spring trade. Any bachelors in need of a buggy would do well to see Mr. Hunziger early, as he has one only special rubber-tired rig which sure would be a great inducement to that girl.

Beginning with next Sunday mass will be said in the old school building at Cargill by one of our priests for the convenience of that part of the congregation living at Cargill and Eden Grove.

FORMOSA

Weiler & Son started their saw mill this week.

Mr. and Mrs August Miller of Belmore spent Sunday in the burg.

Ludwig Steffler's son, of Ambleside, who has been in the Walkerton hospital for the past month is not improving any.

Mrs. Michael Mosack has been seriously ill for the past two weeks.

Joseph Trautman, Ambleside, purchased an automobile in Teeswater last week.

Mr. Peter Kubry is on the sick list.

A hot water heating system is to be installed in the church here.

Mrs. Joseph Brick has been seriously ill for the past two weeks.

Mrs. Jos. Klein and grandson, Homeworth, of Detroit, have been visiting relatives here and in Greenock for the past three weeks.

Miss Annie Brick arrived home on Wednesday of last week, from Preston, to attend to her sick mother.

Mrs. John Hundt left for Perth on Friday to visit her daughter, Ethel.

The Carrick assessor took in our town last week.

PINKERTON

Quite a number attended the anniversary services in Knox church Cargill on Sunday. A load of the young people drove over to the tea meeting on Monday evening.

The snow-shoers are making use of the frosty nights and hard crust.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Elmer Gregg is improving.

One of our young men made his usual southerly migration on Sunday.

Quite a number of people are storing ice. It is a very fair quality this year.

G. T. Rourke, tailor of Walkerton, will be in Cargill on Friday evening, Feb. 26th, with his line of samples for Spring. Don't fail to see him.

LOVAT

Mr. William James Nelson and Willie J. Ross are drawing square timbers for John McGilvary.

Mr. Edgar Mcafee of Portal Sundayed at Mr. William Ross.

Wedding bell are still ringing in the burg.

A large number from around here attended the Fullerton sale, which was a whirl wind of a success. Mr. Fullerton knows how to buy and resell over again.

Mr. Bob Asborne of Sageen is visiting his chum J. G. McGilvary.

Mr. Howard McKeeman is putting out a large number of washing machines, no doubt the right stuff always sells good.

LIKE A LAMB.

The month of March came in like a lamb and therefore according to the old tradition will go out like a lion, or in other words we can look for another four weeks' of winter weather. This, however, is at variance with the opinions of the so-called weather prophets and observers, who almost to a man are predicting an early spring and declare that every indication points to an early breaking up of the winter weather.

PRESENTATIONS

The members of Knox church choir after their regular meeting on Thursday evening last, presented Mrs. N. M. Critchison who has been a valued member of the choir for the past three years, with a set of six pearl handled butter spreaders. WORKING TEN HOURS.

The local branch of the Canada Furniture Co'y, (the Rattan) is once more running ten hours a day and six days a week. The company declare that they have sufficient orders to keep the wheels of the industry in operation full time for some weeks. As trade in general is picking up and factories all over the province are recommencing the ten-hour day, the hard-time bogy is gradually disappearing and those who have been most afraid of this phantom are once more taking heart.

LETTER FROM DR. FRASER

Mr. A. Collins received a letter from Dr. J. J. Fraser, who is with the first Canadian Contingent, last week. The letter was written on February 9th just prior to the disembarkation of the troops on French soil. The doctor's letter was mainly a description of the trip from England to France which he said was made in very rough weather and which continued throughout the five days they were on board ship. The troops, however, were glad that the move had been made and were anxious to get to the firing line. The Canadians landed at St. Lazair.

JUDGEMENT SUSTAINED

The appeal of Ernest H. S. Stevens against the award of a jury at Walkerton of $2,000 in favor of Mrs. Rose Stumpf was refused by the second Appelate Court at Osgoode Hall Toronto, on Monday. Mrs. Stumpe's husband, Michael, it will be remembered was killed while working on a church at Mildmay, Ont., in Aug. 1913. He was in the employ of Wm. H. Pulleyblank and Ernest H. Stephens, contractors. The cause of the accident was a defective scaffold and the action was for $20,000. Stephens alone appealed, alleging that he had nothing to do with the erection of the scaffold but the appeal Court find that he is equally guilty with his partner.

CURLING NOTES

The senior sk p competition games for the Cargill Trophy are now in progress at the curling rink. Three games in the first round have been played, McNamar defeated Lay after an extra end by 17-15, Lippert defeated Robertson by 5 shots and Collins defeated Morrison by 7 shots. Some of the games in the second round draw will be played this week. The Durham curlers are expected here this week and the return games will be played in Durham next week. Local curlers will extend congratulations to Dr. Frank Hughes of Waterloo, a former Walkerton boy whose rink won the district cup in the bonspiel at Toronto.

FARMHOUSE BURNED

Fire which it is supposed originated in the chimney, completely destroyed the new brick residence of Miss B. McLennan in Brant on Tuesday evening There was no one on the premises at the time. Miss McLennan being in town, having attended the funeral of Mrs. Weir that afternoon. The flames were first seen about 7.30 by neighbors Ms. John Halliday and Jack Lundy, who hurried to the scene. The fire had gained such headway, however, that they were unable to save any of the contents of the house, except a few pieces of furniture in the first story. As the house was completed but recently, Miss McLennan's loss will be a heavy one.

ISSUED BAD CHEQUE

Peter Holly, a farmer hailing from near Berve appeared before Magistrate Tolton on Thursday last on a charge of presenting a worthless cheque to Mr. R. L. Gibson, Jeweller. It appears that Holly came to Walkerton on January 20th and on making a purchase at Gibson's presented a cheque for $18.00 on the Royal Bank, Cargill, in payment. The cheque however, was returned to Mr. Gibson marked "no funds" and as Holly made no further attempt to settle his account, Mr. Gibson laid a complaint, which resulted in Holly's subsequent arrest. The magistrate sent him up for trial and Judge Klein later allowed him to go on suspended sentence giving him three months' to pay the jeweller.

MARRIED

SUCCESSFUL CARNIVAL

Good ice, a large crowd of spectators, and an exceptionally large number of masqueraders were the main features of the carnival which was held in Victoria Rink on Tuesday evening under the auspices of the local branch of the Daughters of the Empire. Without doubt this was the most successful carnival ever held in Walkerton. The costumes which bedecked the ice were the very best and the task of the judges, that of picking out the prize winners was a decidedly difficult one. After some deliberation they decided as follows:—

Lady's Fancy Costume
Miss L. Truax as "Folly"
Gent's Fancy Costume
Clare Hugil "A Soldier of Colonial days"
Lady's Comic Costume
Miss S. Ruether "Italian Woman"
Gent s Comic Costume
Herb Hauch
Lady's National or War Costume
Miss Gladys Rife "Brittania"
Gent's National or War Costume
George Sillers "Wounded Soldier"
Girl's best Costume (under 14)
Hilda McNamara "Red Cross Nurse"
Boy's best Costume (under 14)
Norm McCartney

After the judging was completed the races were held. Vic Eidt and Walt Small winning the wheelbarrow race and N. Pleskey the barrel race. These were followed by a burlesque hockey match between the Suffragettes and Fluffy Ruffles which resulted in a tie, 2—2. The teams lined up:—

OBITUARY

Mrs. Gordon Lee

Word was received here on Thursday last of the death of a former resident of Walkerton in the person of Mrs. Gordon Lee of Gladstone, Mich. which took place in Winnipeg on Wednesday. The late Mrs. Lee was 47 years of age had been ill for some time and for the past month had been a patient in the Winnipeg hospital where her death occured, hemorrhage of the stomach being the immediate cause. The deceased, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Lindsay was born in Walkerton and was married to Mr. Lee, twenty-five years ago. Seven years later they left for the west where they have since resided. Besides her husband who has the sympathy of many old friends in Walkerton in his bereavement, the deceased is survived by one brother, Joseph of Walkerton and two sisters, Mrs. D. Mason of Galt and Mrs. Stewart of Hillman, Mich. The remains were brought to Walkerton for burial the funeral being held from the residence of her brother Mr. Joseph Lindsay, on Monday afternoon. The many beautiful floral tributes which adorned her casket, bore testimony of the high esteem in which the deceased was held.

Mrs. Edwin Pengelly

It is our sad duty this week to chronicle the death of Mrs. Edwin Pengelly, one of Walkerton's most respected citizens, who passed away at her home on Victoria st., on Sunday morning after a lengthy illness, pneumonia, from which she had been suffering for the past three week being the cause of her death. The deceased, whose maiden name was Amelia Scoffield was born in Dunnville, Ont., 62 years ago and has been a resident of Walkerton for the past forty years, during which time she became one of Walkerton's best known citizens. Mrs. Pengelly is survived by her husband and one daughter, Mrs. Hodgson of Toronto, three brothers, Walter of Hamilton, and John and Ted of Wisconsin and two sisters, Mrs. George K. Watt of Jacksonville, Fla., and Mrs. Rushmussen of Indianapolis. The funeral which was private took place to the Walkerton cemetery on Tuesday afternoon.

Mrs. Andrew Weir

Another of Walkerton's older citizens passed away on Sunday last in the person of Mrs. Elizabeth Weir, relict of the late Andrew Weir, after having been confined to her bed for several months. The deceased was in her 80th. year. The funeral which was largely attended was held on Tuesday afternoon, interment being made in the Walkerton cemetery.

PRESENTED WITH PURSE

A [illegible] of the citizens of Walkerton met at the Electric Light Office on Saturday evening and presented Capt. G. H. D. Martyn with a purse of gold. There was one likewise presented to Mr. A. Earwaker. This was done in recognition to their sacrifice in leaving their respective business to serve their country. The address was read by Mr. John Rowland and the presentation was made by Mayor Lippert.

ADDITION TO RINK.

Mr. Cloe Clark, proprietor of Victoria rink is planning to make a big improvement in that building during the coming summer. The need of better accommodation for spectators has long been felt and to overcome this, Mr. Clark purposes adding another twenty five feet to the south end of the structure and will erect a large gallery with seating capacity for several hundred people in the new section. With this addition to the rink completed, Walkerton will be able to boast of the best and most up-to-date rink in this part of Ontario.

H. S. 7, BANKERS 4.

After three attempts, the High School (7) team have turned the tables on their opponents, the Bankers Hockey team, by defeating them on Monday afternoon by a score of 7-4. The H. TRUE TO HIS RACE

CHAPTER XXXII.

"Good Heaven, man!" exclaimed the earl, standing up and staring at the surgeon, as if he thought him insane.

"Your own brother, Earl of Wellrose, the son of your own father and mother," continued the surgeon.

"Man, you are mad to say it!" exclaimed the earl.

"Your elder brother, my lord; born two years before you saw the light," persisted the surgeon, rising and standing before the earl.

"You must utterly have lost your reason. Sit down, I beg you, and try to collect your thoughts," said Lord Wellrose, who was himself profoundly agitated, not only by the suddenness, strangeness and importance of this revelation, but by something also in his own mind that assured him of its truth.

"I will sit down and be very quiet. And do you also follow your own advice and my example," calmly replied the surgeon, as he resumed his seat.

The Earl of Wellrose sank into a chair, saying:

"Now, in the name of Heaven, give me your reasons, if you can possibly have any, for making this most astounding statement."

"Certainly, my lord. I should surely never expect you to receive this statement without proof. To begin with, then, I must remind your lordship that at the time of your elder brother's birth, I was the pupil and assistant of Dr. Seton, the medical attendant of your mother."

"I know."

"On that wild March night, when your elder brother was born, I sat up till morning, waiting for the doctor's return. In the gray dawn of the morning, he came home, bringing with him the dead body of a newly-born male child, which he represented to be the child of a charity patient named Magdalene Hurst. He said that he had brought it to the house for post-mortem examination and then burial. With my assistance he performed the autopsy. And the same day the death was duly registered, and the child was buried."

"And this child was not my elder brother?"

"No. This child was what Dr. Seton represented him to be to me—the child of a charity patient who was too poor to bury him. Your infant brother, very fragile, indeed, but still living, lay then upon the bosom of that woman, Magdalene Hurst, who, while in a state of unconsciousness, had been bereaved of her own babe, and had had this one, your infant elder brother, dressed in its clothes and put in its place by her side, and so palmed off upon her as her own. Pardon me, Lord Wellrose, for telling you these truths."

"It is your duty to tell me them, since you believe them. And you say that you have proof?"

"I have proof, my lord."

"Go on, then."

"The child of Magdalene Hurst died, and was buried, as I said. The child of William and Eglantine Douglas, now Duke and Duchess of Cheviot, lay on her bosom in its stead. And yet Magdalene Hurst knew nothing of this fraud that had substituted the living noble for the dead peasant."

"Go on! go on!"

"At length, however, the old nurse, who had been Dr. Seton's only confederate in this 'pious fraud,' as the old doctor honestly considered it, came upon her deathbed, and, being smitten with remorse, summoned Magdalene Hurst to receive her confession. And when Magdalene came she told the astonished woman of the fraud that had been put upon her. And then, before she could utter another word, she died, leaving the woman in perfect ignorance of the real parentage of her foster-child, or of any clue by which she might discover it."

"The last part of this story I have heard already, from Benjamin. There was nothing in the part told me to lead me to suspect that Benjamin was more than a distant kinsman of the family. Oh! good Heaven! If your story be true, as you believe it, how much, how dreadfully, how awfully, has my brother been wronged!" said the young earl earnestly.

The surgeon looked at him in amazement and admiration. Here was no selfish consideration of his own lost rank as eldest son and heir—only the thought of how much his brother had been wronged!

"As yet, Lord Wellrose," he said, "I have produced no proof of the truth of what I have advanced. I proceed to do so now. I was, as I said before, and as your lordship knows, a pupil and assistant of Dr. Seton. I was with him in the latter years of his life, and I attended him in his last illness, and on his deathbed. I was with him when he sent in haste for your father and mother, saying that he had a disclosure to make to them. I was with him when they came to his deathbed side. But they came too late—the power of speech had left him. And it was awful to stand there and see his agonizing efforts to make the disclosure he had summoned them to hear. He died, and took the secret with him to the grave, as everyone supposed."

"My mother always feared it concerned her first-born son," said the earl.

"Her maternal instincts were true. It did concern him. Dr. Seton died, and was buried; and I, his assistant and heir, Christopher Kinlock, succeeded to his property and to his practice. And years passed on. The doctor's death was a thing of the past. His unrevealed secret was forgotten."

"Not by all! Not by my father and my mother! I think that all their lives they have been troubled, at times, by the recollection of the doctor's deathbed, and speculation as to the nature of that disclosure which he tried and failed to make them. But I interrupt you. Pray go on!"

"A long time passed. A generation grew up. This Russian war broke out. I wished for a surgeon's commission in the army, and through the Duke of Cheviot's kindness I obtained it. I had to break up my bachelor establishment in Seton—the establishment, in fact, I had inherited from my predecessor. Among the furniture that I had determined to dispose of was an old writing desk and bookcase. I had emptied it all of its apparent contents, and then ordered it to be carried away to the auctioneer. But in moving the old, mouldering desk, it fell to pieces, and revealed a secret drawer filled with papers. I took possession of the papers, which at first glance seemed to be only old love letters and old memoranda of debts—secret debts, I mean. I had no time to look into them then. Your lordship knows how sudden my appointment was, and how quickly I was called upon to report for duty."

"Yes, of course, I know."

"So, having no time to examine these papers, which I did not, indeed, think of much importance, but which a morbid curiosity incited me to read when I should find time, I bundled them all up and packed them into my trunk, to look over at my leisure. I took them with me to the Crimea. I had no idea of the immense value to one. I had put them in the bottom of my trunk. And in the terrible scenes that followed I forgot them. Later on, my young friend, Lieutenant Douglas, was dangerously wounded. 'If I die, Dr. Kinlock, take charge of my effects and send them to Lord Wellrose,' he said, as he lapsed into unconsciousness. I took charge of his boxes, as he had desired. It was in the simple action of giving out his linen that I came now and then across the name of Benjamin Hurst. I took little account of it at the time."

"It was the name he bore once, as I suppose you now know," said the earl.

"Yes. And when the young man recovered sufficiently to permit of conversation, I called his attention to the fact that this strange name was marked upon some of his clothing. He smiled, but gave no explanation."

"Poor fellow! He kept silence, in regard for me. I had given him a new name."

"Ay, my lord: as I thought. And a mere instinct of justice, if not of brotherly love, must have known it then. In a few days the order came for me to sail for England in charge of the invalided troops. Among these was Captain Douglas, to whom, for good reasons, I gave particular attention. It was during our voyage home that I had ample leisure to look over that old bundle of yellow, mildewed papers that I had discovered in the secret drawer of my guardian's writing desk, when the old, worm-eaten bookcase was accidentally broken to pieces in the attempt to move it. I really felt not the slightest interest in those old papers beyond the languid curiosity of an idle voyager in want of amusement. So I looked but carelessly over the old love letters of the bachelor doctor's boyhood, and the memoranda of old debts come time to be paid, and old wrongs to be set right by post-obit restitution. At length I opened a paper that took away my eyesight and my breath for a full minute. Ah, my lord, it did! As I gazed upon it a mist passed before my vision, and I gasped. Here, my lord, is the paper; look at it for yourself," said the surgeon, placing in the earl's hand a folded paper, yellow with age and speckled with mildew.

The earl took it with calmness, and opened it with care.

First there dropped from the paper a little fine, white knitted sock, which his lordship picked up and examined with much interest.

"I have seen the fellow to this," he said, as he scrutinized the wreath of eglantines and the crest of Seton-Linlithgow embroidered in the instep.

"You have seen the fellow to that, my lord?" echoed the surgeon.

"Yes, in the hands of Captain Douglas. It was a relic of his childhood. He showed it to me before he left England for the Crimea. No doubt he has it still in his possession," replied the earl, as he carefully laid the mute witness aside, and proceeded to the examination of the faded writing on the paper. He read as follows:

Seton, March 1[illegible]

Memoranda of the facts relating to the secret birth and concealment of the first-born son of Eglantine, Baroness of Linlithgow, and William Douglas, of Douglas Cheviot, late a lieutenant in her majesty's [illegible] regiment of foot, stationed in Canada. I was called to Tranch Castle [illegible] shire, on the night of March — 18—, to attend the Baroness of Linlithgow in her confinement.

At twelve, midnight, she gave birth to a male child, and immediately fell into a syncope.

Besides myself, only Lady Shetland and the nurse were present. Circumstances that are known to all the parties interested in this statement and none others need see it, rendered it expedient, for the sake of the family honor, to conceal the birth of this child, and he was committed to me to be disposed of.

After I had recovered my patient from her syncope, and got her, under the influence of morphia, into a refreshing sleep, I took the child, and, while the mother slept in unconsciousness, I carried him to the little seaport of Kilford, and to the house of the woman whom I had already engaged to take charge of a new-born child when it should arrive, without telling her the real parentage of the child.

This woman, by name Magdalene Hurst, was stewardess of the coasting steamer Shaft, but was at this time confined of her first child, a boy.

On reaching the hut where the woman Magdalene Hurst lodged with an old midwife by the name of Jean Craig, I found that my patient was in a profound sleep, and that her child had died while she slept.

Immediately occurred to me a means by which I might conceal the existence of Eglantine Seton's child more effectually than by simply putting him out to nurse. I broached my plan to the old woman in attendance and used such arguments as convinced her of the expediency and propriety of substituting the living infant for the dead one. I clinched my argument by the gift of a few guineas. And I secured her secrecy by a threat of the consequences to herself, as well as to others, should she betray the trust.

The clothing of the dead and the living child was then exchanged. The living child was laid at the bosom of the foster-mother, and the dead one was taken to Seton Old Church, and buried.

Magdalene Hurst was led to believe that the child on her bosom was her own, and Eglantine Seton was told that the child who filled the nameless coffin at Seton Old Church was here.

In a few weeks, Magdalene Hurst, stewardess of the Shaft, went back to London, taking with her the foster-child whom she believed to be her own, and whom she had named Benjamin after his supposed father.

Feeling now the infirmities of old age creeping upon me, and knowing that I may be called suddenly hence, and not wishing to take such a secret with me to the grave, nor yet deeming it expedient to divulge it at this present time, I make these memoranda for the information of those whom it may in future concern, and for those only, knowing that they will guard as I have guarded, the honor of the house of Seton-Linlithgow.

Signed with my hand and sealed with my seal,

ALEXANDER SETON
Of the Village of Seton, physician and surgeon.

In the end, Lord Wellrose folded it.

After reading this strange document carefully and held it in his hand, and fell into deep thought.

Dr. Kinlock refrained from breaking in upon his reverie. At length Lord Wellrose inquired:

"Does Captain Douglas know of the existence of this document?"

"No, my lord, he does not," answered the surgeon.

"Have you mentioned or hinted to him, in any way, the fact of the discovery you have made?"

"No, my lord; no. I deemed it best, for many reasons, not to do so. In the first place, he was in a condition of weakness with tendency to hemorrhage of the lungs, that made absolute quietness vitally necessary. Any excitement must have been very dangerous, and would have been probably fatal to him. In the second place, I thought it due to your family to make the communication first to yourself, my lord, or to your father, the Duke of Cheviot. In the third place, we were very near England when I made the discovery, and before I had thought over the subject many days, I found myself in Southampton waters. I hope your lordship thinks that I did well."

"You did well," said the earl, with much emotion.

"Your lordship thinks the proof of your brother's birth conclusive?"

"Yes, I think it conclusive. With the corroborative testimony we have in our hands, I think it quite indisputable. But, oh gracious, Lord of Heaven, how bitterly has my brother been wronged in all these years!" groaned the earl, covering his face with his hands.

"Your lordship takes no thought of yourself at all in this matter," said the surgeon in amazement.

"Why should I? No one has injured me. But, great Heaven! how he has been wronged! Doctor, we must save him. The best medical skill in England—in Europe—in the world, must be engaged for his restoration to life and health!"

The surgeon gravely shook his head.

"My lord," he said, "I tell you frankly, I have no hopes of saving Captain Douglas' life. He was born with a constitution enfeebled with the sufferings of his mother, even before his birth; that feeble constitution was further undermined by the privations and exposures of his infancy and childhood; and it has received its deathblow in that awful winter before Sebastopol, and in that last fatal wound, received when he planted his colors upon the walls of the citadel."

"I tell you no! He must and shall be saved! All my fortune shall be devoted to his service. The best medical skill in the world shall be secured for him."

"Ah, my lord, there is a limit to the power of wealth, and to the skill of physicians. They cannot raise the dead; they cannot restore the dying!"

"Then God can! Prayer shall aid work, and we shall save him yet!" said the young earl in holy triumph.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

When the surgeon had left the room, the Earl of Wellrose went to his newly discovered brother's chamber. He found the invalid sleeping calmly. He stood by the bed and gazed compassionately upon the fair, [illegible] face.

"He would take my title and estates [illegible] from me, and yet heaven only knows how much I love him! And, oh! Lord of heaven! how cruelly and bitterly he has been wronged!" the young earl murmured as he gazed.

Then, with his own hands, and with almost womanly tenderness and care, he drew the coverlet up over the delicate chest, closed the curtain, and lowered the gas.

Then he opened the communicating door and passed silently into his own room.

His valet was there, ready to attend him.

"I shall not require anything more to-night, Perkins. You can go," said his lordship.

The valet bowed and withdrew.

Lord Wellrose threw himself into an armchair beside a table, with his elbow resting upon the top and his head bowed upon his hand. He felt no disposition to retire to rest. His mind was oppressed with thought of the startling revelation he had received from the surgeon. He could not for an instant doubt its truth. Beyond all question Benjamin Douglas was his elder brother, the son of his parents by their first rash, childish marriage.

But the heaviest of all was the thought how that elder, even in helpless infancy, had been cast down into the lowest depths of the social hells, while he, the younger, had always lived in the heaven of family love, and moral, religious, and intellectual culture, enjoying privileges that should have been the blessings of both.

But now full justice must be done to that deeply injured elder brother, at whatever cost to himself, the younger, or to anyone else.

As he could not sleep, he drew his table closer to the table, drew writing materials toward him and wrote two letters. The first and least important was a short one addressed to Mrs. Bruce, the housekeeper at Seton Court, directing her to have the house opened and aired, and rooms got ready to receive him and his guests, who expected to reach Seton on the evening of the fourth day from the date of that letter. The second, and most important one, was addressed to his father, the Duke of Cheviot at Cheviot Castle, earnestly requesting the duke and duchess to join their son at Seton House, at the end of a week from date, and giving as a reason for this request very important business that would be better discussed at Seton than at Cheviot.

How to Keep the Feet Cool.

Hot, burning, tender feet are much more of a vexation in summer than at other season of the year. One of the best methods of cooling the feet is to bathe them with camphor water after having washed the feet (and dried them) with cold water. Wear all white, pale, yellow or gray stockings and either white, gray or tan shoes. Changing the stockings and shoes several times a day relieves the burning and tenderness almost as much as the bathing with cold water.

Operation Decided On As Only Means of Relief

But the Writer of This Letter Resolved to Try Dr. Chase's Ointment First and Was Cured.

This is not an isolated case, for we frequently hear from people who have been cured of piles by using Dr. Chase's Ointment after physicians had told them nothing short of an operation could bring relief and cure.

If you could read these letters, coming as they do, day after day and year after year, you would realize what a wonderful curative agent Dr. Chase's Ointment really is. Few ailments are more annoying or more persistently torturing than piles, and when this suffering is promptly relieved by the application of Dr. Chase's Ointment there can be no doubt as to where credit is due. Friends and neighbors are told of the results and as the good word spreads, and Dr. Chase's Ointment is becoming known far and wide as the only actual cure for piles or hemorrhoids.

Mr. Charles Beauvais, a respected citizen of St. John's, Que., writes:—"For 14 years I suffered from chronic piles or hemorrhoids and considered my case very serious. I was treated by a well-known physician who could not help me, and my doctor decided on an operation as the only means of relief. However, I resolved to try Dr. Chase's Ointment first. The first box brought me great relief, and by the time I had used three boxes I was completely cured. This is why it gives me such great pleasure to recommend Dr. Chase's Ointment to everybody suffering from hemorrhoids as a preparation of the greatest value."

"Engaged Man's Panic."

"Engaged man's panic" is as familiar a phenomenon as the squawking chicken or the flopping of a hooked fish. And woman instinctively anticipates it, feels it before it actually begins, deals with it according to her abilities. No woman ever feels that this is a slur upon her. She knows that it does not involve her, but is only the nervousness of the free at the touch of the matrimonial bridle—and that bridle, as she knows and as he knows, is not in her hands, but in the hands of society. Even the man marrying for a home, even the man marrying for children or for money, even the man marrying because only by marriage can he hope to get some one to associate with him, bear with him, listen to him on terms of his own arranging—even these men feel the nervousness as the bridle drops over their heads and the bit presses their quivering lips.—From "Deguarine's Wife," by David Graham Phillips.

One More Splendid Cure By Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Quebec Man who Suffered for a Long Time from Kidney Disease Finds a Complete Cure.

Adams Mills, Portneuf, Co., Que., March [illegible] (Special)—Another splendid cure by Dodd's Kidney Pills is that of Michael Gauthier, a well-known resident of this place. Mr. Gauthier was for a long time a sufferer with a pain in his head caused by kidney disease, and at length got so bad that he had to quit work. Dodd's Kidney Pills cured him. He is back at work, strong and hearty, and naturally he feels that he wants all who suffer from kidney disease to know that they can find a cure in Dodd's Kidney Pills.

For Dodd's Kidney Pills not only cure the pain or ache that is causing the most distress, they put the kidneys in good working, and all the impurities and poisons are strained out of the blood. The result is that new strength is carried to every part of the body. That's why so many sufferers cured by Dodd's Kidney Pills sum up their condition, "I feel like a new man." New energy is new life. You can't have it with sick kidneys. With healthy kidneys you must have it. Dodd's Kidney Pills make healthy kidneys.

Irish Wit.

Even little children in Ireland, according to Hugh O'Donnell, have the true Irish sense of humor. He was standing before Nelson's statue, he said, when he asked a youngster, "Was Nelson really Irish?"

"That he was," replied the child. "That's why he is what he was."

WHAT WAR MEANS.

Wanton Destruction May Mark the Progress of an Army.

"All is fair in love and war" runs the old saying, and Mr. E. A. Vizetelly in his volume of reminiscences, "My Days of Adventure," proves the truth of it. Referring to the appearance of the railway station at Nantes during the Franco-German war, he says:

"Never since have I seen anything resembling it. A thousand panes of glass belonging to windows or roofing had been shivered to atoms. Every mirror in either waiting or refreshment rooms had been pounded to pieces, every gilt frame broken into little bits. The clock lay about in small fragments; account books and printed forms had been torn to scraps, partitions, chairs, tables, benches, boxes, nests of drawers had been hacked, split, broken, reduced to mere strips of wood; the large stoves were overturned and broken, and the marble refreshment counter, some thirty feet long and previously one of the features of the station, was strewed [illegible] in particles [illegible]. It was indeed an amazing sight, the more amazing as no such work of destruction could have been accomplished without extreme labor.

"When we returned to the inn for dinner I asked some questions.

"'Who did it?'

"'The first German troops that came here,' said the answer.

"'Why did they do it? Was it because your men had cut the telegraph wires and destroyed some of the permanent way?'

"'Oh, no. They expected to find something to drink in the refreshment room, and when they discovered that everything had been taken away they set about breaking the fixtures.'"

The Keys of the Universe.

In the year 1695 William Patterson, founder of the Bank of Scotland, conceived the grand project of planting on the isthmus of Darien a British colony which, in his own words, "should secure for Great Britain the keys of the universe, enabling their possessors to give laws to both oceans and to become the arbiters of the commercial world." This colony was actually founded at a place still known as Puerto Escoces, but its people were subsequently forced by the Spaniards to evacuate and return to Scotland.

Cooper's Hawk.

The almost universal prejudice against birds of prey is due to the activities of a few members of the hawk family, chief among which is the Cooper's hawk. OUR POTENTIAL SOLDIERS.

(Montreal Herald-Telegraph)

The idea of compulsory service is hardly likely to win acceptance, but a general scheme whereby every Canadian could learn to shoot would be most valuable.

It is perhaps not generally realized that in Canada every able-bodied man between 18 to 60 is, according to the laws of the land, liable at any moment to be called out for military service—which means that every Canadian is by law a potential soldier and that the machinery for conscription is all ready and may be put into force whenever it is felt to be wanted.

SOURCE OF SHELLAC.

Insects Producing It Are Victims of Their Own Industry.

Scale insects of the genus coccidae are responsible for one of India's most interesting exports, lac, the export value of which amounts to nearly $[illegible] annually. Lac is the resinous exudation of the insect. The insects live upon the twigs of certain trees, and soon become covered with a resinous secretion that increases in thickness, protecting the body and the eggs.

When a colony, consisting of a few adult females and one or two males, find their way to a new branch, they attach themselves to the bark, and having pierced it with holes through which they draw up the resinous juices upon which they feed, they become fixed or glued by the superfluous excretion, and after a time die, the females forming by their dead bodies little domes or tents over the myriads of minute eggs which they have laid. In a short time the eggs burst into life, and the young, which are very minute, swarm over the twig in such countless numbers as to give it the appearance of being covered with blood red dust. Generation after generation dwells upon the same twig until it is enveloped in a coating of the resinous exudation often half an inch thick.

In the beginning the insect was much collected for the dye it contains. Later when the use of the resin became known the demand for the dye began to diminish, until now it has been almost completely displaced by coal tar colors. After separating the resin from the coloring matter the former constitutes the shellac of commerce.—Argonaut.

Radium in the Upper Atmosphere.

Hess, of the Vienna Radium Institute, has recently published the results of some remarkable experiments. He has investigated the penetrating radiation which occurs in the upper atmosphere by means of balloon ascents, and he arrives at the startling conclusion that at a height exceeding 2,000 metres there is a rapid increase in the intensity of the penetrating rays. At these heights the penetrating rays from the earth itself would be absolutely negligible, while that from the radium emanation in the air, which has its origin in the earth and is of limited life, must be, at any rate, less than at the surface. So that it would seem we must assume some extra-terrestrial source for these radiations. The conclusion that a great part of the penetrating radium cannot come from the known radio-active constituents of the earth and atmosphere is one that must evoke general interest, and calls for the further radio-active exploration of the upper atmosphere.

The Care of the Scalp and Hair.

All treatments have been [illegible] by [illegible] women and men to make the hair grow. The best of drugs are of doubtful efficacy, as experience has proven. Doctors themselves are baffled. Theoretically, anything which will increase the flow of blood to the scalp should favor the growth of hair. Massage of the scalp and an [illegible] with the finger tips every day for three minutes will bring the blood to the surface, supply nourishment to the hair. Rubbing with [illegible] tonic or lotion. If there is any disease of the scalp a physician should prescribe for this condition. Brushing the hair [illegible] of the brush every day will stimulate the roots of the hair, as it is a kind of massage.

It is necessary to air the hair to keep it glossy and in health. Women should shake out the hair and let it hang over their shoulders for half an hour or longer every day.

If hair is very oily, once a week is not too often to shampoo it. Dry brittle hair needs less washing—only twice a month. Keep these three things in mind if you would have beautiful hair: Brush it, air it and massage the scalp every day.

THE FARMER'S MISTAKE.

An old farmer drove into a small town the other day and stopped at the country store. A phonograph had just been installed and the farmer decided to have a few cents worth of music. The clerk handed him the ear-tubes, placed them in proper position, and immediately started the machine.

The farmer instantly dropped the tubes and rushed to the door, crying "Great snakes! Hold on a minute, will ye? There's a gol-darned brass band a-comin', an' there ain't nobody a-holdin' my horse."

"Knotty" History.

Tying knots in a handkerchief to jog one's memory had its origin in China thousands of years ago. Before writing was invented in that country, which did not happen until 3,000 B. C., memorable and important events were recorded by long knotted cords. The most ancient history of China is still preserved as told by these knots. When Emperor Tschang Ki invented writing the entire system of "knotting" was abandoned. And to-day the memory knots made by us in handkerchiefs are the only surviving descendants of that ancient custom.

EDITORIAL

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1915.

THE U. S. AND THE HAGUE.

It ought to be known to all Englishmen, to Canadians, to Australians, to everybody, that The Hague conventions, because they were not ratified by all the belligerent nations, are without binding force and impose upon our Government no obligation to make protest against acts therein forbidden. The conventions being inapplicable, we revert to the general principles of international law, and in law there can be found no warrant for what is demanded of us, no reason for departure from the strict neutrality we have observed.—New York Times.

The above extract is taken from a sympathetic editorial in our New York namesake. It is a friendly note to us telling why the States cannot be expected to interfere on behalf of Britain in the present struggle. The Hague conventions not being signed and adopted by the powers are null and void, and have no force in international law. Consequently neutral powers must be guarded by such international law. We are not going to dispute our contemporary's ruling. But it might be pointed out that The Hague tribunal of 1907 adopted a convention for the creation of an International Prize Court of Appeal, which led to the calling of a fresh conference on prize law. This conference sat in London from Dec. 4, 1908, to Feb. 26, 1909, and was confined to representatives of the following countries: Great Britain, France, Germany, United States of America, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Japan, Holland and Spain. It adopted a series of rules on naval warfare relating to blockade in time of war, contraband of war, unneutral service, destruction of neutral prizes, transfer to neutral flag, enemy character, convoy, and resistance to search and compensation.

These rules were adopted, and no doubt it is under these that the British Prize Court will decide the fate of the Wilhelmina and of the Dacia, and we believe that the British and American view of what constitutes a blockade is identical. On the principles adopted by this Prize Court of Appeal we imagine that the American Government will take its stand, and that it will continue to refuse to recognize Germany's submarine invasion as an effective blockade. Germany's threat to strew the North and Atlantic Seas with floating mines, if carried out, would be not only in contravention of the rules of The Hague convention, but in defiance of all laws and even of civilization itself. What will the United States do in such circumstances? Will it wait until an American vessel has been sunk by such mines before it makes a protest or takes action?

WHERE DEATH LURKS.

"The Deadly Toll of Trespass on Railways," a bulletin of the Railway Business Association of the United States, a national organization of manufacturing, mercantile and engineering concerns dealing with railroads, urges upon the State Legislatures stricter laws and stricter enforcement of laws for the prevention of trespassing on railways. "There were," the bulletin declares, "33,000 persons under 21 years of age killed or injured while trespassing on railways of the United States from 1901 to 1910, enough to make a mile post for every mile around the world." Comparing the record of the United States and the United Kingdom the following figures are quoted:

United States, 1901-10, killed, 50,025; injured, 53,427.

United Kingdom, 1901-10, killed 1,434; injured, 1,315.

Telling why this striking difference exists, the explanation is given:

"In the United States laws against railroad trespassing are generally not enforced.

"In the United Kingdom persons other than passengers or employees found on railroad property are fined $10 for each offence."

France punishes trespassers by fines up to $579 and jail up to a month; Germany, by fines up to $25; Canada by fines up to $50 and imprisonment up to two months. The Wabash Railroad operates a part of its mileage through Canada. In the year ending June 30, 1914, of the 91 trespassers killed on that road only three were killed in Canada. In the United States laws are few, and even where penalties are prescribed, magistrates hesitate to impose them, as local authorities dislike to feed and lodge convicted tramps. Trespassers, however, include little children and wage earners living in the vicinity, whose death or disability leaves families destitute.

Elevation of tracks in Chicago was resorted to at an expense of 70 millions, which is expected to reach 150 millions. Trespassers leap over a city ordinance and climb up to the elevation in their conscientious devotion to the pursuit of being killed and maimed. In three months 339 arrests were made on the elevated right of way of four systems. Only 67 of the offenders were punished. Thirty-five states have no laws specifically prohibiting persons walking on railroad right of way. Thirteen states by statute prescribe penalties ranging from $5 fine to ten days in jail in Maine to $500 fine or one year in jail in New York. Wisconsin, Maine, New York, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Virginia, Missouri, Rhode Island, Delaware, Georgia, Minnesota and Washington.

The Buffalo Express admits that Sir Edward Grey makes two strong points in his reply to the U. S. Government. He says that 25 neutral ships have been destroyed by mines scattered in the open sea by Germany and he suggests that this is a matter more worthy of neutral protest than the sending to a prize court of eight out of the 773 ships which have left United States ports since the war began. It may be mentioned that the U. S. did not protest against the laying of these mines.

During the last fiscal year the Lemieux Act was invoked in nineteen cases, and in every case a strike was averted. The number of men affected was 50,876. During the twelve months there were 113 strikes affecting 29,536 men and causing a labor loss of 1,287,678 days, in cases where the opportunities for arbitration afforded by the act were not invoked. These figures are excellent proof of the grand work that the Act is doing in connection with labor matters. Had the Act been taken advantage of in the other strikes the results, no doubt, would have been equally favorable.

Interviewed as to how the new imposts will affect the Grand Trunk Railway, Mr. Chamberlin is reported as saying:

"Well, I see that the tax is put on way bills, pay envelopes and coal—7½ per cent. 'ad valorem,' on the latter. Now, we use something like 1,500,000 tons of coal on the Grand Trunk proper, and something like 560,000 tons on the Grand Trunk Pacific. With the tax on way bills and pay envelopes and coal, I figure that we are in for an impost of something between $750,000 and $1,000,000 per annum. I am getting the departmental officers to make out precise statements in respect to the total amounts; but it is in the neighborhood. One does not see exactly why the railways should have to pay the tax on way bills and pay cheques; but that is how it reads."

None of this money will go to defray war expenses. The war money will be borrowed. The increased tariff and special taxes are to meet the ordinary expenses of government, which have increased at an enormous rate under the Tory Government, while the revenue was falling.

The Old Fashioned Purging and Griping Action of Pills Is Now Done Away With.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills gently unlock the secretions, clear away all waste and effete matter from the system, and give tone and vitality to the whole intestinal tract.

They do this by acting directly on the liver, and making the bile pass through the bowels instead of allowing it to get into the blood, and thus causing constipation, jaundice, catarrh of the stomach and similar troubles.

Mrs. L. M. Ratchford, Peterboro, Ont., writes: "Having been troubled for years with constipation, and trying many different remedies which did me no good whatever, I was asked to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. I have found them most beneficial, for they are indeed splendid pills, and I can gladly recommend them to all people who suffer from constipation."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all druggists or dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

A Public Idol

Ah, it was gone forever, nothing would ever recall it—that one quick moment of living contact! In a deeper sense than met the ear, she was on the stage and he among the audience. To the end his gray life would play the part of spectator to hers, or else she would soon have passed beyond his grasp and touch, just as Elvira would have vanished in a little while from the sight of the great audience which now hung upon her every movement.

Then from the consciousness of his own private smart he was swept out, whether he would or no, into the general current of feeling which was stirring the multitude of human beings around him, and he found himself gradually mastered by considerations of a different order altogether. Was this the actress he had watched with such incessant critical revolts six months before? Was this the half-educated girl grasping at results utterly beyond her realization, whom he remembered?

It seemed to him impossible that this quick, artistic intelligence, this nervous understanding of the demands made upon her, this faculty in meeting them, could have been developed by the same Isabel Bretherton whose earlier image was so distinctly graven on his memory. And yet his trained eye learned after a while to decipher in a hundred indications the past history of the change. He saw how she had worked and where the influences which had been brought to bear upon her were all familiar to him; they had been part of his own training, and they belonged, as he knew, to the first school of dramatic art in Europe—to the school which keeps alive from generation to generation the excellence and fame of the best French drama. He came to estimate by degrees all that she had done; he saw also all she had still to do. In the spring she had been an actress without a future, condemned by the inexorable logic of things to see her fame desert her with the first withering of her beauty. Now she had, as it were, but started toward her rightful goal, but her feet were in the great high road, and Kendal saw before her, if she had but strength to reach it, the very highest summit of artistic success.

The end of the first act was reached, Elvira returning from the performance of the marriage ceremony in the chapel of the palace, had emerged hand in hand with her husband, and, followed by her wedding train, upon the great. She had caught sight of Macias standing blanched and tottering under the weight of the incredible news which had just been given to him by the Duke. She had flung away the hateful hand which held her, and with a cry, instinct with the sharp and terrible despair of youth, she had thrown herself at the feet of her lover.

When the curtain fell, Edward Wallace could have had few doubts—if he had ever cherished any—of the success of his play. He himself escaped behind the scenes as soon as Miss Bretherton's last call was over, and the box was filled in his absence with a stream of friends, and a constant murmur of congratulation, which was music on the ears of Madame de Chateauvieux and, for the moment, silenced in Kendal his own throbbing and desolate consciousness.

"There never was a holiday turned to such good account before," a grey-haired dramatic critic was saying to her, a man with whose keen, good-natured face London had been familiar for the last twenty years. "What magic has touched the beauty, Madame de Chateauvieux? Last spring we all felt as though one fairy god-mother at least had been left out at the christening. And now it would seem as though even she had repented of it, and brought her gift with the rest. Well, well, I always felt there was something at the bottom in that nature that might blossom yet. Most people who are younger at the trade than I would not hear of it. It was commonly agreed that her success would last just as long as the first freshness of her beauty, and no more. And now—the English stage has laid its hold at last upon a great actress."

Madame de Chateauvieux's smiling reply was broken by the reappearance of Wallace, round whom the buzz of congratulation closed with fresh vigor.

"How is she?" asked Madame de Chateauvieux, laying a hand on his arm. "Tired?"

"Not the least. But, of course, all the strain is to come. It is amazing, you know, this reception. It's almost more trying than the acting. Forbes in the wings, looking on, is a play in himself!"

In another minute the hubbub had swept out again, and the house had settled into silence.

Macias was the central figure of the second Act. In the great scene of explanation between himself and Elvira, after he had forced his way into her apartment, his fury of jealous sarcasm, broken by flashes of the old absolute trust, of the old tender worship, had been finely conceived, and was well rendered by the promising young actor, whom Wallace had himself chosen for the part. Elvira, overwhelmed by the scorn and despair of her lover, and conscious of the treachery which has separated them, is yet full of blind resolve to play the part she has assumed to the bitter end, to save her own name and her father's from dishonor, and to interpose the irrevocable barrier of her marriage vow between herself and Macias. Suddenly they were interrupted by the approach of the Duke and of Fernan Perez. Elvira throws herself between her husband and her lover, and, having captured the sword of Macias, hands it to the Duke. Macias is arrested after a tumultuous scene, and is led away, shaking off Elvira's efforts to save him with bitter contempt, and breaking loose from her with the prophecy that in every joy of the future and every incident of her wedded life, the spectre of his murdered love will rise before her, and "every echo and every breeze repeat the fatal name, Macias."

During the rapid give and take of this trying scene, Kendal saw with a kind of incredulous admiration that Isabel Bretherton never once lost herself, that every gesture was true, every word struck home. Her extraordinary grace, her marvelous beauty were all subordinated to, forgotten almost in the supreme human passion speaking through her. Macias, in the height of his despair, while he was still alone with her, had flung her his sword, declaring that he would go forth and seek his death an unarmed and defenceless man. Then, when he becomes conscious of the approach of his rival, the soldier's instinct revives in him; he calls for his sword; she refuses it, and he makes a threatening step toward her.

Mac.—My sword, Elvira.

Elvira—Never.

Beatriz—Ah! they are here. It is too late!

Elvira—Go! No blood shall flow for me. Come no nearer or I sheathe it in this breast.

All the desperate energy of a loving woman driven to bay was in her attitude as she replied to Macias, whereas in the agony of her last clinging appeal to him, as his guards lead him off, every trace of her momentary heroism had died away. Faint and trembling, recoiling from every harsh word of his as from a blow, she had followed him toward the door, and in her straining eyes and seeking, outstretched hands as she watched him disappear, there was a pathos so true, so poignant, that it laid a spell upon the audience, and the curtain fell amid a breathless silence, which made the roar that almost instantly followed doubly noticeable.

But it was in the third act that she won her highest triumph. The act opened with a scene between Elvira and her husband, in which she implored him, with the humility and hopelessness of grief, to allow her to retire from the world and to hide the beauty which had wrought such ruin from the light of day. He, in whom jealousy has taken a fierce root, refuses with reproach and insult, and in the full tide of her passionate reaction against his tyranny, the news is brought her by Beatriz that Fernan, in his determination to avoid the duel with Macias on the morrow, which the duke, in accordance with knightly usage, has been forced to grant, has devised means for assassinating his rival in prison. Naturally, her whole soul is thrown into an effort to save her lover. She bribes the guards. She sends Beatriz to denounce the treachery of her husband to the Duke, and, finally, she herself penetrates into the cell of Macias, to warn him of the fate which threatens him and to persuade him to fly.

It was, indeed, a dramatic moment when the gloom of Macias's cell was first broken by the glimmer of a hand-lamp, which revealed to the vast expectant audience the form of Elvira standing on the threshold, searching the darkness with her shaded eyes, and in the great love scene which followed the first sharp impression was steadily deepened word by word and gesture after gesture by the genius of the actress. Elvira finds Macias in a mood of calm and even joyful waiting for the morrow. His honor is satisfied; death and battle are before him, and the proud Castilian is almost at peace. The vision of Elvira's pale beauty and his quick intuition of the dangers she has run in forcing her way to him produce a sudden revulsion of feeling toward her, a flood of passionate reconciliation; he is at her feet once more; he feels that she is true, that she is his. She, in a frenzy of fear, cannot succeed for all her efforts in dimming his ecstacy of joy or in awakening him to the necessity of flight, and at last he even resents her terror for him, her entreaties that he will forget her and escape.

"Great heavens!" he says, turning from her in despair, "it was not love, it was only pity that brought her here." Then, broken down by the awful pressure of the situation, her love resists his no longer, but rather she sees in the full expression of her own heart the only chance of reconciling him to life, and of persuading him to take thought for his own safety.

Elvira—See, Macias, these tears—each one is yours, is wept for you! Oh, if to soften that proud will of yours this hapless woman must needs open all her weak heart to you, if she must needs tell you that she lives only in your life, and dies in your death, her lips will brace itself even to that pitiful confession! Ah me! these poor cheeks have been so blanched with weeping, they have no blushes left.

To her this supreme avowal is the only means of making him believe her report of his danger, and turn toward flight; but in him it produces a joy which banishes all thought of personal risk, and makes separation from her worse than death. When she bids him fly, he replies by one word, "Come!" and not till she has promised to guide him to the city gates and to follow him later on his journey will he move a step toward freedom. And then, when her dear hand is about to open to him the door of his prison, it is too late. Fernan and his assassins are at hand, the stairs are surrounded, and escape is cut off. Again, in these last moments, when the locked door still holds between them and the death awaiting them, her mood is one of agonized terror, not for herself, but for him; while he, exalted far above all fears, supports and calms her.

Macias—Think no more of the world which has destroyed us! We owe it nothing—nothing! Come, the bonds which linked us to it are forever broken! Death is at the door; we are already dead! Come and make death beautiful—tell me you love, love, love me to the end!

Then, putting her from him, he goes out to meet his enemies. There is a clamor outside, and he returns wounded to death, pursued by Fernan and his men, and Elvira defends him from her husband with a look and gesture so terrible that he and the murderers fall back before her as though she were some ghastly avenging spirit. Then, bending over him she snatches the dagger from the grasp of the dying man, saying to him with a voice into which Isabel Bretherton threw a wealth of pitiful tenderness, "There is but one way left, beloved. [illegible] that should have been [illegible] herself and you [illegible]!"

And in the dead silence that followed, her last murmur [illegible] upon the air as the armed men, carrying torches, crowded round her. "See, Macias, the torches, how they shine! Bring more—bring more! And light—our marriage festival!"

"Eustace! Eustace! there, how they have let her go! Poor child, poor child! how is she to stand this night after night? Eustace, do you hear? Let us go in to her now—quick, before she is quite surrounded. I don't want to stay, but I must just see her, and so must Paul. Ah, Mr. Wallace is gone already, but he described to me how to find her. This way!"

And Madame de Chateauvieux, brushing the tears from her eyes with one hand, took Kendal's arm with the other, and hurried him along the narrow passages leading to the door on the stage, M. de Chateauvieux following them, his keen French face glistening with a quiet but intense satisfaction.

As for Kendal, every sense in him was covetously striving to hold and fix the experiences of the last half hour. The white muffled figure standing in the turret door, the faint lamp-light streaming on the bent head and upraised arm—those tones of self-forgetful passion, drawn straight, as it were, from the pure heart of love—the splendid energy of that last defiance of fate and circumstance—the low vibration of her dying words—the power of the actress and the personality of the woman—all these different impressions were holding wild war within him as he hastened on, with Marie clinging to his arm. And beyond the little stage-door the air seemed to be even more heavily charged with excitement than that of the theatre. For, as Kendal emerged with his sister, his attention was perforce attracted by the little crowd of persons already assembled round the figure of Isabel Bretherton, and, as his eye travelled over them, he realized with a fresh start the full compass of the change which had taken place. To all the more eminent persons in this group, Miss Bretherton had been six months before an ignorant and provincial beauty, good enough to create a social craze, and nothing more. Their presence round her at this moment, their homage, the emotion visible everywhere, proved that all was different, that she had passed the barrier which once existed between her and the world which knows and thinks, and had been drawn within the circle of individualities which, however, undefined, is still the vital circle of any time or society, for it is the circle which represents, more or less brilliantly and efficiently, the intellectual life of a generation.

Only one thing was unchanged—the sweetness and spontaniety of that rich womanly nature. She gave a little cry as she saw Madame de Chateauvieux enter. She came rushing forward and threw her arms around the elder woman and kissed her; it was almost the greeting of a daughter to a mother. And then, still holding Madame de Chateauvieux with one hand, she held out the other to Paul, asking him how much fault he had to find, and when she was to take her scolding; and every gesture had a glow of youth and joy in it, of which the contagion was irresistible. She had thrown off the white head-dress she had worn during the last act, and her delicately tinted head and neck rose from the splendid wedding gown of gold-embroidered satin—a vision of flower-like and aerial beauty.

Fast as the talk flowed about her, Kendal noticed that everyone seemed to be, first of all, conscious of her neighborhood, of her dress rustling past, of her voice in all its different shades of gaiety or quick emotion.

"Oh, Mr. Kendal," she said, turning to him again after their first greeting—was it the magnetism of his gaze which had recalled hers?—"if you only knew what your sister has been to me! How much I owe to her and to you! It was kind of you to come tonight. I should have been so disappointed if you hadn't!"

Then she came closer to him, and said archly, almost in his ear:

"Have you forgiven me?"

"Forgiven you? For what?"

"For laying hands on Elvira, after all. You must have thought me a rash and headstrong person when you heard of it. Oh, I worked so hard at her, and all with the dread of you in my mind!"

This perfect friendly openness, this bright camaraderie of hers, were so hard to meet!

"You have played Elvira," he said, "as I never thought it would be played by anybody; and I was blind from first to last. I hoped you had forgotten that piece of pedantry on my part."

"One does not forget the turning points of one's life," she answered, with a sudden gravity.

Kendal had been keeping an iron grip upon himself during the past hours, but as she said this, standing close beside him, it seemed to him impossible that his self-restraint should hold much longer. Those wonderful eyes of hers were full upon him; there was emotion in them—evidently the Nuncham scene was in her mind, as it was in his—and a great friendliness, even gratitude, seemed to look out through them. But it was as though his doom were written in the very candor and openness of her gaze, and he rushed desperately into speech again, hardly knowing what he was saying.

"It gives me half pain, half pleasure, that you should speak of it so. I have never ceased to hate myself for that day. But you have travelled far indeed since the 'White Lady'—I never knew any one to do so much in so short a time!"

She smiled—did her lip quiver? Evidently his praise was very pleasant to her, and there must have been something strange and stirring to her feeling in the intensity and intimacy of his tone. Her bright look caught his again, and he believed for one wild moment that the eyelids sunk and fluttered. He lost all consciousness of the crowd; his whole soul seemed concentrated on that one instant. Surely she must feel it, or love is indeed impotent!

But, no—it was all a delusion! She moved away from him, and the estranging presence rushed in again between them.

"It has been M. de Chateauvieux's doing, almost all of it," she said, eagerly, with a change of voice, "and your sister's. Will you come and see me sometime and talk about some of the Paris people? Oh, I am wanted! But first you must be introduced to Macias. Wasn't he good? It was such an excellent choice of Mr. Wallace's. There he is, and there is his wife, that pretty little dark woman."

Lesson X. March 7, 1915.

Saul Anointed King—1 Samuel 8; 1-10, 27. Print 9. 17-10. 1.

Commentary.—I. Asking for a king (8. 1-22). It can not be known definitely how long it was after the great victory of Israel over the Philistines at Ebenezer, that the demand was made for a king. During Samuel's old age he called upon his sons to share the responsibility of the judgeship with him, and made them judges in the southern part of the land. Joel and Abiah, Samuel's sons, were far from possessing the excellent qualities of their father. They were partial in their judicial decisions and were guilty of accepting bribes. The elders of Israel were so displeased with their conduct that they went to Samuel and told him of the evil conduct of his sons, and asked him to give them a king, such as the nations about them had. Samuel knew that it was God's will that Israel should be ruled by judges and that the theocracy should continue. He was grieved at their demand for a king, and went to the Lord in prayer regarding the matter. The Lord assured Samuel that the people were not rejecting him as judge, but were rejecting himself and told him to listen to the demand of Israel for a king. He should tell them plainly, however, what they must expect from a king. Samuel carried the Lord's message to the people and told them how a king would oppress them.

II. Saul and Samuel meet (9. 1-21). 1-14. The Lord knew where to put his hand upon a man whom He could make king of Israel. Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was "a mighty man of power," and he had a son who was "a choice young man." He was a head taller than the rest of the people. If Israel desired a powerful man as king, then surely Saul would meet their demands. It was a peculiar train of providences that brought Saul to Samuel's notice. Kish had a herd of asses, and these animals were highly prized then, and are still in the East. They had strayed away, and naturally Saul was sent, and a servant with him, to find them. Saul failed to find the asses, but he found Samuel, whom the Lord would have him meet.

15, 16. Just the day before this the Lord had told Samuel that on the next day he would send to him the man who was to reign over the people, and he should anoint him king. 17. Samuel saw Saul—God's appointments were perfectly timed. Saul arrived at Ramah at the right time. Samuel was expecting the future king to appear then. Samuel would know that Saul was the man, for God at once assured him. Shall reign over my people—Literally, "Shall restrain my people." A peculiar word, contrasting the restraints of a settled government with the license of the time in which "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" Judges 21: 25).—Kirkpatrick. 18. Where the seer's house is—Saul's one desire was to learn where his father's asses were; he was seeking these and not a kingdom. He thought the seer would be able to help him locate the lost animals. 19. The high place—Samuel had erected an altar unto the Lord (Judges 7: 17), and it was probably on the high place here mentioned. God had said that there should be but one centre of worship, but the condition of affairs in Israel was unsettled, and it may have been permissible to have altars aside from the one at the tabernacle. Ye shall eat with me to-day—Samuel had already honored Saul by bidding him to go up before him, and he further honored him by acting as his host. This was entirely unexpected by Saul. All that is in thine heart—Samuel would at once tell Saul about the lost asses, but not until the next day would he make known to him his great work. Saul may have had some sort of intimation from within that he was to perform an important service for his nation. 20. They are found—Saul desired to know about the lost animals, and he found out, but he learned much more. Samuel was a seer, but he knew about the asses because the Lord told him, and he told him not only to relieve Saul's mind, but to assure him of the authority he had in giving him a message from the Lord. On whom is all the desire of Israel—The desire of Israel was for a king, and since Saul was the man whom God had chosen, the people's desire was toward him, though they did not know whom God would give them. 21. The smallest of the tribes of Israel—The tribe of Benjamin had been all but exterminated about three centuries before.

22. Into the parlor—"Into the guest-chamber."—R. V. Chiefest place—This is a double superlative. It indicates that the place of highest honor was given to Saul. That were bidden—It was the occasion of a sacrificial feast. "About thirty persons" were invited by Samuel to eat with him in the house, and these, probably, were present. The rest ate outside. 23. Bring the portion—We note from this verse that Samuel was expecting the future king to come to him on this day, and had, accordingly, given directions to have a particularly choice portion reserved for the distinguished guest. 24. Took up the shoulder—The right leg was the priest's portion, and would fall to Samuel. He reserved this for Saul as a mark of honor.

III. Saul anointed King (9.25-10. 1.) 25. Communed with Saul—Nothing is said regarding the nature of the conversation. We may reasonably suppose that they spoke of the condition and needs of the nation. Upon the top of the house—The flat roofs of Oriental houses are much used as places for rest, conversation and sleeping. It has been suggested that upon the housetop Samuel and Saul could be readily seen, and the people present would know the honor conferred upon Saul by the prophet. 26. The spring of the day—The rising of the day, or dawn. Abroad—Out of the house. 27. Bid the servant pass on—That Samuel might be alone with Saul. That I may show thee the word of God—The time had now come for Samuel to make fully known to Saul the fact of his divine appointment as king. 1. Vial of oil—The Hebrew is emphatic, "The flask of oil"; probably the only anointing oil described in Exod. 30: 23-33, which Samuel had prepared for this express purpose.—Whedon. Poured it upon his head—By this act Saul was set apart for a distinctive work, as men were set apart by this ceremony to the priesthood.

IV. Saul proclaimed king (10. 2-27.) As Saul was leaving Samuel, he was told of three signs that would confirm to him the message he had received from the Lord through Samuel. He would meet men by Rachel's tomb who would report the finding of his father's asses. He would meet three men going up to Bethel, who would give him bread. As a third sign he would meet a company of prophets and he himself would prophesy and would be changed into another man. Samuel later called the people of Israel together at Mizpeh and explained to them that the reason a king would be given was that they had rejected God. Saul was chosen by lot as king. This was in harmony with what had already been done. The people acknowledged him as their king. The inhabitants of Gibeah, however, would not honor him.

Questions—Why did the children of Israel ask for a king? What had been the nature of the government? What directions did the Lord give Samuel regarding their demand for a king? Explain how Saul came to meet Samuel. How did Samuel treat Saul? Describe the anointing of Saul. What signs did Samuel give to Saul? Describe the meeting at Mizpeh. How did the people of Gibeah treat Saul?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—National revolution.

I. A rejection of divine sovereignty.

II. Based on international rivalry.

I. A rejection of divine sovereignty. Israel's demand for a king was made in a constitutional manner and came before Samuel with all the weight of a formal decision on the part of the representatives of the nation. We can scarcely imagine the feelings of Samuel as he heard their desire expressed. The tide of popular feeling did not swerve him, but he was deeply wounded by Israel's evident aversion to God's time and ways. Their proceedings were premature and hasty and conducted without reference to the will of God. Israel's wish to have a king to lead them out to battle betrayed a thirst for war and a distrust of the Lord's power to defend them. Decline in the theocratic belief and life was ever the one sign of weakness in the Hebrew commonwealth. Much of his life-work seemed to Samuel to be wasted unless the form of government under which he had brought the land to prosperity continued. The Jewish nation could not appreciate Samuel. His intense and consistent godliness was not popular among them. Their moral status was unworthy of the free government God had given them. Samuel's strong, pure character towered in magnificent sublimity above the fickle, selfish age in which he lived. When his ungrateful country called him to resign his office as judge after long years of honorable and acceptable service, and to yield his authority to another, Samuel did not resent or complain. His conduct sets before us the wisdom of timely concession, the nobility of self-renunciation. Though Israel's request was an affront to Samuel, he never seemed so great as in the last scenes of his public life. He towered high above the infirmities of ignoble minds. The Lord explained the case to Samuel and told him what to do. Samuel found relief for his burdened heart, sympathy under bitter disappointment, guidance in great perplexity, submission to the Lord, strength for painful duty, composure amid general excitement and confidence in a glorious future. God assured Samuel that while the people professed deep concern about the moral depravity of Samuel's sons and the welfare of the nation, they were, in reality, casting off their God. He was reminded that this was not a new case of sudden refusal of the divine sovereignty. It was an outburst of an hereditary vice. It was essential apostasy, practical idolatry.

II. Based on international rivalry. The elders of Israel were actuated solely by political motives. In vain did Samuel warn them of the disapproval of God and the costs of their decayed monarchy. Their desire to rival and compete with other nations was loosening their connection with Jehovah as ruler. The basis of their revolution was in effect their rejection of a theocracy for a constitutional monarchy. Israel resented the thought of being considered in any way inferior to the surrounding nations. Only a man of ripened wisdom could have presided over so far-reaching a change. Personal humiliation was lost sight of in Samuel's desire to save Israel from the full consequence of their sins. He gave his services as phophet as faithfully when the question was injurious to himself as on any occasion. Having ascertained the will of the Lord concerning his people, Samuel aimed at nothing but to carry it into effect with courtesy, tenderness, dignity and grace. Infallible wisdom guided Samuel and Saul in their meeting, preparatory to kingly rule in Israel. Saul's appointment was of God, and the purpose of it was the deliverance of his people. Samuel found much that was good in Saul, reverence for his father, diligence in business, modesty and humility. He was warm-hearted, dignified and sincere. He exhibited no vanity upon his elevation. His conduct gave promise of a bright future. The true purpose of life was unfolded to Saul by Samuel. Everything was calculated to impress on Saul that his elevation to the royal dignity was not simply good fortune but he and the people must see the hand of God in it. T. R. A.

BAD BLOOD

Is The Cause of Boils and Pimples.

When boils or pimples start to break out on your face or body you may rest assured that the blood is in an impure state, and that before you can get rid of them it will be necessary for you to purify it by using a good medicine that will drive all the impurities out of the system.

Burdock Blood Bitters is a blood purifying remedy. One that has been on the market for the past forty years. One that is known from one end of the country to the other as the best blood purifier in existence. It cures boils, pimples and all other diseases arising from bad blood.

BOILS CURED.

Mr. Andrew E. Collier, River Glade, N.B., was troubled with boils for years, in fact, did not know what it was to be rid of them until he used Burdock Blood Bitters. It cured him.

PIMPLES CURED.

Mr. Otto Boyce, Yarker, Ont., had his face and neck break out with pimples. He tried several kinds of medicine without success. Two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters banished them.

SECOND WEEK IN LEGISLATURE

WAR TAX

A levy of one mill on the dollar, or one-tenth of one per cent of all taxable property in the province, is the war tax which the Ontario Government intends to collect. Since the amount of taxable property in the province is estimated at $1,800 000,000, the annual revenue from this source will be about $1,8000, 000. The tax, it is said will last only during the war.

The Opposition, although supporting fully any measures for the assistance of the Allies and our own country in the war, want to make sure that this purpose will actually be accomplished and in the ensuing debate it is predicted that they will ask for definite assurance that money raised by this special tax will be devoted to war purposes exclusively and not diverted to other channels as in the case of the Northern Ontario Development Fund and also ask for specific details or at any rate definite forecasts of the nature of the contributions the Government is likely to make.

A HUGE DEFICIT

For the first time since the Conservative Government has been in power in Ontario they admit a deficit. For several years the Opposition has claimed that ordinary book keeping would reveal not the alleged surplus but a balance on the wrong side. This year the Government admits it but whereas they place the figures at about $700,000, the Opposition claims that the total is about $4,000,000. Moreover, the Liberals object to the Government contention that the figures showing less than $3000,000 expended on war contributions. The Opposition points out that one item in the current receipts amounting to over $500,000 is openly disowned in the Government statement by the auditor himself who appends a note refusing to take responsibility for the item. This, therefore, makes the Government deficit admittedly $1, 200,000. The rest of the deficit which the Opposition would raise from $1,200,000 to nearly $4,000, 000 comes from items charged to capital account which ten years ago used to be charged to current revenue and which the Opposition claims should still be so credited. It is noticeable in the house and in the press that the Government and its supporters are hard pressed to find plausible reasons for the huge deficit which they have piled up.

GOOD MAIDEN SPEECHES

"A much stronger Opposition" is the unanimous verdict of those who have visited the Ontario Legislature this year. All the new Liberal members have not spoken yet but those who have done so have created a most favorable impression. Major Tolmie of Windsor gained special mention and praise even from Conservative papers like the Toronto News. Samuel Carter, of South Wellington, (Guelph) held the attention of the house by his vigor of mind and trenchant criticism. Nelson Parliament, of Prince Edward County was applauded both by Government and Opposition for his broad-guaged and patriotic speech on the budget. G. A. Gillespie of West Peterboro showed a real grasp of the agricultural problem and Mac Lang of Porcupine showed that he would be a capable spokesman for the north country.

A FRANK CONSERVATIVE

J. W. Johnston, Conservative member for west Hastings, is the first Government member to discuss fully the temperance question this session. He was quite frank in his support of the license system, though license holders should not be interfered with and made a violent attack on the ministers of the province who had spoken for temperance and the abolition of the bar. He was warmly applauded by his colleagues who showed that they too were coming out openly in defense of the license system.

Mr. Johnson was answered by Hugh Monro, Liberal member for Glengarry, who as a business man told how his business and the efficiency of his men had been interfered with by the liquor traffic, and how his business had improved with the doing away of the traffic in his town. Major Tolmie defended the patriotism of the ministers, who true to their convictions at whatever cost, had spoken at the general election against the liquor traffic.

NOTES

On the suggestion of Mr. Rowell, a cable of praise and good cheer was sent by the Legislature to the Ontario Brigade upon the occasion of their first experience in the trenches.

The Provincial Treasurer made a slashing attack on those insurance companies who had refused to pay the increased tax placed on life insurance premiums last year. The companies affected have made a vigorous reply.

The Moratorium Bill was given its second reading. Mr. Rowell claimed that since it really was not a Moratorium in the usually accepted, broad meaning of that term, the name of the Bill should be changed. The matter will be up again.

The Nickle question is still under consideration.

G. R. McKeown, M.P.P., for Dufferin, is the new Conservative Whip.

On all sides you hear people talking hard times. The hard times talk is overdone and has got to be a habit. By continually talking hard times the times get hard. It should be remembered that industry pays debts while despair increaseth them.

FIRE IN NEW POST OFFICE.

Fire broke out in the basement of the new Post Office building in course of erection here last Tuesday evening about 7.15 o'clock, and was noticed by a passerby and the alarm given. The brigade turned out promptly and the blaze was soon extinguished. The cause of the fire is a mystery. It is fortunate that the fire started early in the evening. Had it occurred several hours later the whole building would likely have been gutted.—Hanover Post.

THE BLOOD IS STREAM OF LIFE

Pure Blood Is Absolutely Necessary To Health

"FRUIT-A-TIVES" PURIFIES

These Wonderful Tablets, Made of Fruit Juices, Are The Best Of All Tonics To Purify And Enrich The Blood.

Pure, rich blood can flow only in a clean body. Now, a clean body is one in which the waste matter is regularly and naturally eliminated from the system. The blood cannot be pure when the skin action is weak, when the stomach does not digest the food properly, when the bowels do not move regularly, when the kidneys are strained or overworked.

Pure blood is the result of perfect health and harmony of stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and skin.

"Fruit-a-tives", by their wonderful action on all these organs, keeps the whole system as clean as Nature intended our bodies to be clean.

"Fruit-a-tives" tones up, invigorates, strengthens, purifies, cleans and gives pure, rich, clean blood that is, in truth, the stream of life.

"Fruit-a-tives" is sold by all dealers at 50c. a box, 6 for $2.50 trial size 25c. or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

Dr. de Van's Female Pills

A reliable French regulator; never fails. These pills are exceedingly powerful in regulating the generative portion of the female system. Refuse all cheap imitations. Dr. de Van's are sold at $5 a box, or three for $10. Mailed to any address. The Scobell Drug Co., St. Catharines, Ont.

Easiest Way to Clean Cutlery—

Just use a little Panshine sprinkled on a damp cloth, and let your cutlery be as dirty, greasy, grimy as it may, Panshine will make it glistening, sweet and clean in a jiffy. For an easy shine, use

PANSHINE

It's just as good for painted work and woodwork—for pots, pans, linoleums and bathroom fixtures. Panshine is a pure, white and clean powder, without any disagreeable smell and does not harm the hands.

PATRIOTISM AND PRODUCTION

"I would urge the farmers of Canada to do their share in preventing the people of Great Britain from suffering want or privation."
HON. MARTIN BURRELL, Minister of Agriculture.

The Empire Needs Many Foods

In the past Great Britain has imported immense quantities of these staple foods from Russia, France, Belgium, Germany and Austria-Hungary as shown by the following:

Average Imports Years 1910-1913

Wheat	28,439,600	bush.
Oats	23,586,394	"
Barley	15,192,268	"
Corn	7,621,374	"
Peas	703,058	"
Beans	639,653	"
Potatoes	4,721,590	"
Onions	271,569	"
Meat	26,609,766	lbs.
Eggs	121,112,916	doz.
Butter and Cheese	51,765,233	lbs.

The above mentioned sources of supply of staple foods are now, in the main, cut off as a result of the war. Great Britain is looking to Canada to supply a large share of the shortage. Every individual farmer has a duty to perform.

Millions of bushels rather than millions of acres should be Canada's aim.

That there is abundant reason to expect larger returns from the same area is conclusively shown when we compare the average production of the present time with the possible production. Note the following brief table which shows the average in 1914 and possible production per acre.

	Average	Possible
Fall Wheat	20.43	52.
Spring Wheat	14.84	33.
Barley	16.16	69.
Oats	36.30	91.
Corn, Grain	70.	200.
Corn Ensilage (tons)	12.	18.
Peas	15.13	37.
Beans	18.79	60.
Potatoes	113.40	450.
Turnips	421.61	1000.

By "possible" is meant the actual results which have been obtained by our Experimental Farms and by many farmers. These "possibles" have been obtained under intensive cultivation methods and conditions not altogether possible on the average farm, yet they suggest the great possibilities of increased production. By greater care in the selection of seed, more thorough cultivation, fertilization, better drainage, the average could be raised by at least one-third. That in itself would add at least $150,000,000 to the annual income of Canada from the farm. It would be a great service to the Empire, and this is the year in which to do it.

Increase Your Live Stock

Breeding stock are to-day Canada's most valuable asset. The one outstanding feature of the world's farming is that there will soon be a great shortage of meat supplies. Save your breeding stock. Plan to increase your live stock. Europe and the United States, as well as Canada, will pay higher prices for beef, mutton, and bacon in the very near future. Do not sacrifice now. Remember that live stock is the only basis for prosperous agriculture. You are farming, not speculating.

Mr James Warren, C. E., Walkerton. was in town the latter end of the week on business. He is hale and hearty and former Kincardine friends were pleased to see him looking so well.—Kincardine Reporter

Assessor Vandrick, of Port Elgin, puts the following in the Times: "Don't monkey with the assessor. Make your income affidavits at once, or pay the penalty". Short and to the point and he plays no favorites.

EYE REMOVED.

Mrs. Samuel Kingston, of 10th con., Eld., accompanied her second son, Alonzo, to Toronto on Monday, where the young fellow will have one of his eyes removed. While attending the threshing last fall he was hit in the eye by a grain of wheat, which has cause him serious trouble ever since. We hope the city specialists may see their way clear to effect a cure without removing the optic.—Chesley Enterprise.

COUNTRY LIFE TOO SAD

One of the unemployed, in Toronto, when asked on Monday if he wanted work on a farm, stated that he was willing to accept if he received his pay every week, and if the farmer would declare Saturday afternoon a half-holiday so he could attend the picture show or any other amusement in the nearest town. Men accustomed to the cities are more afraid of the country life than they are of the work. This man was accustomed to throwing a pick, and doing a hard day's work, but he preferred to eat cheap meals, securing one or two days employment each week, and be kicked from post to pillar, to that of living in the country where there was no brass bands or picture shows.—Ripley Express.

BE MORE CONSIDERATE.

There is a letter in The Christain Guardian from: "A Farmer's Daughter." She wants to know how the women in the country can have social pleasure when they are afraid to go on the roads. Reckless motorists flaming through the rural districts at night with headlights which blind a horse and the woman driving it, at a quarter-of-a-mile have made the good roads impossible for women and an annoyance for men. There is a stupidity amongst all classes of people—even amongst motor owners. The passion to get from here yonder at a rate of 40 miles an hour and without consideration for the feelings and welfare of the people who built the roads is one of the offensive by-products of progress.

WEST TO BOOM.

The Western Provinces of Canada seem to be in the path of prosperity. There is going to be a big boom out West this coming summer, said a Toronto traveller, who has just returned to the city. They are preparing for a summer's traffic out there such as they never had before. There is no tourist traffic to Europe this year. The traffic, therefore, all goes to the West. The Panama Exposition is drawing a lot of it and the trippers will return by way of Canada. In Banff and other resorts you cannot engage a room even now. The C. P. R. is to add 400 rooms to its hotel in Banff and it is said they are all taken already. The Star was told that the C. P. R. expects to carry a tourist traffic of over 500,000 during the summer

AN EXTRA EDITION NEEDED.

It is announced by the Department of Agriculture of Ottawa that the first edition of ten thousand copies of the Agricultural War Book is exhausted. Another and larger edition is being printed to provide copies to meet applications that have for some time been accumulating.

GET RID OF YOUR GROUCH.

Have you anything to whine about? Have you anything to grouch about? The chronic growler should caste his eye toward Europe. There conditions are bad. Here times are good. Plenty to eat, pleasant homes, everybody prosperous. Get rid of your grouch and let a hymn of thankfulness go up to the Creator for his goodness to you.

START A GARDEN.

Nothing, says a contemporary, is more delightful in the evenings of spring and early summer than digging, planting and attending to a little garden—to watch the seeds bursting through the warm soil and thrusting their tiny faces upward to meet the sunlight and showers. There is pleasure in watching growth from day to day, noting the process of ripening for use, and there is joy in eating the fresh, crisp toothsome vegetables from our own soil, not to speak of the saving in money or the lack of vegetables, when perhaps money might be available. There is ample reward and compensation in the labor itself, in an added object in life and a pleasant and profitable employment of time that might be spent in profitless idleness or expensive idleness. If you have not tried gardening, do it this year.

OUT OF THE RUNNING

Hard luck Walkerton. The Walkerton hockey club met defeat in Listowel last week on Wednesday evening, the latter team scoring 14 goals to Walkerton's 4. The county town team went to Listowel with a four goal lead and thus lose on the rounds by six goals. Walkerton is now out of the running in the Northern League series and we understand that they intend challenging the Port Elgin team for the Bowman trophy. As soon as the ice hardens the local seven intend arranging home and home games with their old rivals if Walkerton is willing, as the Mildmay club is confident that they can turn the tables on the Brant seven and wipe out the defeat which Walkerton handed out to them in the league games of a few weeks ago.—Gazette.

EXTRA REVENUE NOT FOR WAR

The general concensus of opinion throughout Canada is that the new taxes and tariff increases imposed by the government, are for the purpose of paying directly for the equipping of Canadian troops for the war and for the war and for home defence purposes. The increase in taxation, however, has not been imposed with this end in view. It is intended to liquidate the country's expenditures and debts, or in other words, to pay the ordinary bills of the country, and not its war bills. The money to cover Canada's war expenditures is coming from England, and apparently will continue to come from there. The statement of the Minister of Finance, Hon. Mr. White, shows that there has been a decided falling off in revenue. The total expenditures during the coming year, according to the Minister of Finance, are estimated at over $300,000,000, including a war expenditure of $100,000,000. It is proposed to borrow the whole of the latter amount On the present basis the revenue would yield only $120,000,000—a shortage of $80,000,000. The greater part of this deficit will be realized, however, from the new taxes imposed, and which went into effect almost immediately on announcement.

LIVED OVER 100 YEARS.

Mrs. McKenzie, mother-in-law of Mr. Kenneth McLean of Ripley, passed away on Monday at the advanced age of 100 years and 3 months. The deceased had been a [illegible] for 45 years. The funeral took place on Wednesday to Lochalsh cemetery, the services being conducted by Rev. D. A. McLean.—Ripley Express.

WIARTON ALL THE WAY.

As we arose to remake some time ago and on many sundry occasions within the last month or more, Wiarton is possessed of some flossy hockey seven. They are just now boring their way on toward the finals of both the O.H.A. and the Northern League. They have had pretty fair going latterly. Sarnia is the latest team to curl up and die before their onslaught. Sarnia has a fast team, one that was figured to come near to the money this year. Wiarton, just to show them that they knew nothing about hockey slipped it over Sarnia last Saturday night in Sarnia, by a score of 4 to 3. On Wednesday night of last week they played Sarnia in Wiarton, on ice that was more like mush than anything else, and Wiarton had the best of the argument by quite a number of percentage, winning by 6 to 0, thus taking the round by seven goals.

RETURNING SPRING.

Though the recent mild weather was not an indication that spring was going to open up at once, it was at least, a pleasant reminder that it is not far off. It is now less than five weeks to the first of April, and when we have reached that we expect to see quite a change in the face of nature There is a joy about the climate of this part of Canada which others, say the people of California, do not experience. There is no returning spring there. There may be times when we think the winters of Canada are too severe, but we have not much reason to complain in this part of it. The joy of the returning spring are to a large extent compensation for the disadvantages of winter, but how many compensations it has in itself, especially for the younger portion of the community, the skating, the hockey and other outdoor winter sports. Then there are the advantages of better roads in the newer parts of the country, enabling transportation to be done at a lighter cost. The snow which helps to make these good roads brings other benefits in enrichment of the soil to a greater extent than if it fell in rain. The climate of Ontario is a glorious one after all, and the present winter which in a few weeks will be over has been a pleasant one Any discomfort we may have felt will soon be forgotten in the return of spring with opening buds, soon to be expanded into foliage, the reclothing of the earth with verdure and the general rejoicing of nature which always seems to accompany this season of the year.

The History of the County of Bruce
And of The
Minor Municipalities Therein
(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)
Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps,
Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

ANOTHER INDIAN V. C.

The coveted medal was won some time ago, but the sepoy was seriously ill and could not receive it when His Majesty decorated another Indian V. C. in France. A Punjabi, Khudadad Khan was the first Indian to win the Cross.

The 129th Regiment was one of the first two regiments of the Indian Corps to come into action in Europe. Their gallantry and steadiness at a critical time proved of great value. The regimental machine-gun section of the 129th, which was composed of men drawn from all classes of the battalion, was on October 30th at Hollebeke, Belgium, placed in the portion of the defence held by the Fifth Lancers.

This part of the line was subjected to a very heavy bombardment and the machine gun section in particular was singled out for an especially heavy shell fire. Man after man was hit, but the brave detachment continued to serve their guns, inflicting severe loss on the enemy. Eventually one of the two guns was put out of action by a direct hit on it by a shrapnel shell. The British officer, Captain R. F. Dill, who was commanding the section, was wounded in the head at about this time, but continued the action until forced to give up the command and was carried to the rear.

The team of the remaining gun, however, still kept on firing under the command of Color-Havildar Ghulam Muhammad, another Punjabi. Eventually the enemy, developing vastly superior forces, advanced to the attack regardless of the losses inflicted. The heroic gun team, fighting to the last, were bayoneted at their posts. Khudadad Khan, the sole survivor, though badly wounded, did not quit his gun till he had ensured that it would be valueless to the enemy. He managed after a time to rejoin his company.

IS IT BOTHWELL'S BODY?

The doubt which has long existed as to where James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, and husband of Mary Queen of Scots, was buried is now to be settled.

In the Danish country church of Faarevejlle, in Northeast Zeeland, a mummified body has lain since 1578. This was traditionally believed to be Bothwell's remains, but doubts were held as to the correctness of the belief. In May, 1858, the coffin indicated as Bothwell's, was opened and a portrait was taken of the head of the body. This is now in the museum of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland. Nothing was discovered, however, clearly to identify the body as Bothwell's, as a large number of Scottish prisoners have been buried there.

Now, working on certain facial measurements provided by Sir Archibald Buchan Hepburn, of Smeaton-Hepburn, from the original portrait of Bothwell in his possession, and with the permission of the Danish Government and the local church authorities, the grave is to be opened again and the point settled.

The Earl of Bothwell, "the glorious, rash and hazardous young man," won Queen Mary's favor after a series of intrigues, among which was the murder of Darnley, the Queen's husband, in 1567. Darnley was blown up by gunpowder in the Kirk o' Field, Edinburgh. Bothwell himself carried the news to Holyrood that "the strangest accident that ever chancit, to wit, the founder (lightning) came out of the luft (sky) and burnt the King's hoose."

LONDON'S GREAT TRAFFIC.

During 1913 2,007,318,055 passengers were carried by railway, tramway, and omnibus in London, states the annual report of the London Traffic Branch of the Board of Trade. The number of journeys per head of the population of Greater London was 271.5.

One of the most remarkable features of the report is the steady decline shown in the passengers carried by rail. Horses are very rapidly being supplanted by motors, and the extinction of the horse for passenger purposes, says the report, seems now almost in sight.

CHEERFUL TAXPAYERS.

"People are paying their income tax this year somewhat more promptly because, as they say, they are now getting something for their money." This was the statement of an income-tax official to a representative of The Daily Mail.

The income tax was imposed originally as a war tax and was kept on the schedule of taxes when war was ended because of its elasticity. To-day it is filling its original purpose, and for the first time for many years it is developing little grumbling or discontent.

NOTES.

One of the subjects which the Local Government Board has ordered an enquiry, is the proposal of the Sheffield Corporation to borrow £10,000 for the purchase and laying out of land at Tinsley Park Wood as a municipal golf course.

On Tuesday week, at the White Hart Hotel, Doncaster, a presentation was made to Mrs. Jane Strudwick of a handsome cutlery cabinet subscribed for by a few friends in commemoration of her recent marriage.

The death occurred, suddenly, in the street, of Mr. Thomas Beckwith (61), of Elmfield road, Doncaster. For many years he carried on business as a newsagent and printer in St Sepulchre Gate.

A pony driver named Willie Chappell, aged 15, of Upper Hoyland, was killed on Monday week in the Parkgate seam of the Rockingham Colliery. When discovered he was dead, having apparently been run over by some full corves.

Mr. Paul Ernest Sandlands, who has been appointed Recorder at Newark, was called to the Bar in 1903. He fought throughout the South African war. He has practised in practically every court in the Midland Circuit, and has acted as Deputy Recorder of Lincoln. He is Revising Barrister for the Ilkeston, West Derbyshire, South Derbyshire, and Rushcliffe Divisions.

Mr. F. C. Arkwright, the Squire of Willersley, and Deputy-Lieutenant for Derbyshire, has been appointed chairman of the Cromford Volunteer Regiment of Home Guards, of which his head gardener (Mr. W. Reads) is the commander. At a meeting Mr. Arkwright said that he did not know whether he could dig trenches, but he would promise to at once start practising.

Colonel Lord Salisbury is gazetted a division commander and to be temporary brigadier-general.

The King has given £100 to Queen Alexandra's Field Force Fund for providing comforts for troops on active service.

The "London Gazette" contains notification that Colonel the Marquis of Salisbury has been appointed a divisional commander and temporary Brigadier-General, dating from 8th January.

The Norfolk floods have caused, it is roughly estimated, £[illegible] worth of damage.

Rifle ranges for tramway employees are to be established by the London County Council at some of the tramway depots.

Mr. J. T. Jenkyn, D. Sc., has been appointed adviser in agricultural botany at the University College of North Wales.

Dr. George Gulland, brother of the new chief Liberal whip, has been appointed professor of medicine to the Edinburgh University.

Detectives are endeavoring to trace £200 worth of radium, which is missing from the Skin Hospital in John street, Birmingham.

One of the last of the Welsh Crimean veterans, Pte. Rendall, of Cal[illegible], Port Talbot, died on Saturday week at the age of 88. He had medals of Sebastopol, Inkerman and Alma.

Mr. Wm. Edgar Allen, founder of Edgar Allen & Co., died on Thursday week.

The death has occurred at the residence of Littleover, Derby, of Mr. H. T. Jackson, general passenger agent of the Midland Railway, in his 62nd year. The deceased entered the company's service at Derby in January, 1872, as a junior clerk in the department of the superintendent.

The death occurred at Scarboro of Mr. Henry Stephenson, who was 62 years of age, was a member of the Scarboro Council from 1897 to 1903, and was chairman of several committees.

A miner named William Park was rescued from the Varfield Iron Ore Mines near Barrow after being five a half days entombed.

The death has occurred at the Tooting Home for the Aged and Infirm of Captain David Jackson in his 108th year. Captain Jackson was the oldest master mariner in Great Britain.

Three married women named Coutts, Rae and Honeyman were killed and six others were seriously injured by the collapse of a wall at Old Ford road, Aberdeen. The wall was in course of erection at some fish-curing premises, and it fell on to a shed where a dozen women were packing fish. The sudden atmospheric changes from frost to thaw is thought to have caused the wall to collapse.

At the judging for the championships at the National dog show, Birmingham, an English setter, Wetheral Blue Girl, belonging to Mr. George Potter, Carlisle, was awarded the trophy for the best dog in the show. This was the first time the dog had been shown.

Mr. Lloyd-George has written as follows to Mr. Tudor Rees, Cardiff, in connection with the raising of a temperance company in the 3rd Battalion Welsh Regiment: "I earnestly commend the admirable proposal to my countrymen . . . and am sure your appeal for recruits will meet with an enthusiastic and immediate response. Gwell angau na chywilydd. (Death before dishonor.)

Arrangements for receiving wounded soldiers into the new Red Cross hospital at Dublin Castle are now complete. In the throne room there are fifteen beds, and in the ante-room and drawing-room twenty-four more. The picture gallery, where hang the pictures of past Lords Lieutenant of Ireland, contains twenty-seven beds, and the outlook on the upper castle yard is exceptionally bright and cheerful. The apartments which command a view of the castle garden are for wounded officers. About nineteen beds have been placed in the bedrooms usually assigned to the King and Queen, the King's dressing-room and study, and the private secretary's room.

Major E. C. Teale, the chief constable of Eastbourne, has been awarded the Cross of Officer of the Royal Order of the Saviour by the King of Greece. King Constantine and Queen Sophia have been frequent visitors to Eastbourne for several weeks.

William Uphill, aged forty-seven, a retired army sergeant-major, and his three-year-old daughter, Alberta Winifred, were run over and killed by a heavy motor bread van while crossing the street of St. George's Cross, Glasgow. Mrs. Uphill had a narrow escape. She just jumped clear as the wheels passed over her husband and daughter.

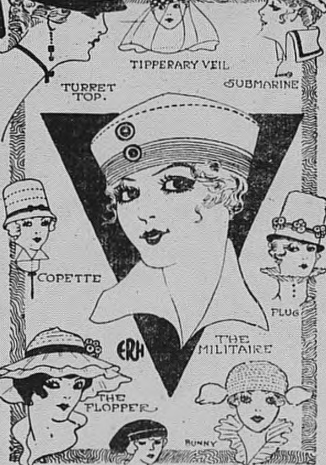
The death occurred in the Guilford Infirmary of Albert Watts, aged seventy-three, who had been admitted a few days before from Woking in a deplorably emaciated and dirty condition. His death was due to physical and mental decay, caused by self neglect. The relieving officer found in the room where Watts was lying two purses, one containing ninety sovereigns and the other £20 [illegible] in money and also two bank books showing that there was £211 14s 5d standing to his credit.

Found by his son lying on the scaffolding, 130 feet from the ground, at the new Guildhall tower at Hull, Mr Alexander Thomas, a sculptor, employed on the statuary of the Guildhall, died before he could be removed to the ground. At the inquest medical evidence was given that death was due to natural causes.

Following on a letter addressed by Lord Mayo to the press, which the Irish National Volunteers regarded as an attack on them, the farmers of Kildare would not allow Lord Mayo to ride with the Kildare Hounds over their lands at the next meet near the town. Mr. John Hackett, an elderly sporting farmer, informed Lord Mayo that the farmers resented his attitude, and that Lord Mayo accordingly withdrew from the hunt.

Over two hundred dwelling houses have been partly submerged by the floods in the fen-lands of Southwest Norfolk caused by the collapse of the bank of the Little Ouse River on January 16. Another piece of the river bank, forty feet in width, has given way.

PEACE OR WAR--YOU MAY TAKE YOUR CHOICE WHEN YOU PICK YOUR NEW HAT



It will be either peace or war this spring in the country where Mlle. Millinery rules, for fashion refuses to remain in the middle of the road.

If you are of militant tendency you may affect the "turret top" hat as prim and severe as the turret from which the big guns deal destruction; or you may favor the tiny "Tipperary" hat with its billowy veil and military feather. The "Militaire," a jaunty little caplike headdress, an exact duplicate of the cap worn by the Kaiser's soldiers, and the "submarine" which looks like what it's named after are other military modes.

The peace-loving maid has not been forgotten by Dame Mode. For her has been designed the severe little "copette" of gunmetal grey satin trimmed with a narrow band of scarlet velvet ribbon, and the plug hat in black or white trimmed with bunches of red cherries, the "bunny" with its rabbit ears, and the lacey picturesque "flopper" which is the very embodiment of peaceful sentiments.

The Mayor of King's Lynn has been informed by the Prime Minister that it is the intention of the Government to deal with the damage caused by the recent air raid by measures similar to those adopted in the cases of the bombardment of Hartlepool and Scarborough. These measures have been described as "relief from Imperial funds."

Mr. Frances Muir Keton, a well-known local builder, died suddenly at Nottingham County Court. He was listening with anxious intentness to his solicitor's cross-examination of a witness when he fell forward in his seat. On being carried out he was found to be dead. The court was adjourned for half an hour.

England's oldest industry, the flint knapping business, still carried on in Brandon, Suffolk, is experiencing a brisk business as a result of the war. Although the war has stopped the export of flint implements to West Africa and South America, the flint knappers are busy in their workshops fitting up tinder boxes for the use of the soldiers at the front.

On Wednesday last week there died at his residence, Market Place, Wokingham, Mr. William Joseph Gotelee, the blind printer, publisher and bookseller. Mr. Gotelee was, despite his affliction, a chess-player of no mean order. His remarkable powers of memory enabled him to retain not only his own and his opponent's moves, but to carry over to a future period the position of every piece on the board at the time of stopping the play. He was in 1885 one of the first members of the then newly formed Wokingham Town Council.

Mrs. Brantfell, wife of Mr Capell Lisle Aylett Brantfell, of Evesham, Worcestershire, an officer in the Glamorganshire Yeomanry, was found drowned with her child in a pond at Kempsey, Worcestershire. At the inquest Lieutenant Brantfell said his wife was worried at his going to the front. A verdict of suicide in the case of the mother and murder against the mother in the case of the child was returned.

An Obliging Enemy.

A negro truck driver backed his wagon into the space allotted to a rival transfer concern at a railway freight depot in Dallas, Tex.

"Hey, dar, niggah!" yelled the driver on whose territory the other had trespassed. "I'll knock yo' out'n yo' hoss an' home if yo' don't back up."

"I's got no home," retorted the offending driver. "Now what yo' gonna do 'bout dat?"

"I'll dig yo' one, niggah—I'll dig yo' one!"

WHAT "SHOCK" MEANS.

How It May Affect the Physical and Mental Systems.

In medical language "shock" means the depression of the vital forces, both mental and physical. The condition may result from many causes and may vary from a faintness and pallor that soon disappear to a state so desperate that the sufferer dies of it, as in the case of serious accident or difficult surgical operations.

Shock may also be the result of an overpowering emotion, like great terror. That kind of shock is often seen in the survivors of any terrible accident. Many who have not got so much as a scratch suffer for a long time from a state of impaired health. Sometimes their nervous systems are so badly shattered that they never entirely recover. That is one of the many reasons why foolish practical jokes are wrong. It is not funny to dress up like a ghost, to jump out on timid children from behind doors, to play "jokes" with dead mice or snakes. And such pleasantries are dangerous as well as stupid. Many an unfortunate child has been made the slave of fear all his life by reason of a shock that some playmate gave him in his youth. The remedies that the physician uses are those which will restore the blood to its normal state and stimulate the vital functions. For shock associated with great loss of blood the best thing is to inject salt solution. For shock without hemorrhage, a stimulant of some kind is generally given.—Youth's Companion.

Cats and Wildcats.

Wild cats are now rarities in Europe, though formerly they were comparatively common in most parts of the continent. The few survivors occur mostly in Hungary and occasionally in Spain and Greece. In Spain, by the way, the animals build nests in trees or among tall bushes for the rearing of their young, though generally they prefer a crevice in a rocky country in which to make a lair. Our domesticated cat is not derived from the untamable European animal, but was introduced readily tamed from Egypt.—London Mail.

An Australian Hospital at the Front

(By Frank Miller.)

Boulogne.—On the topmost part of the northern cliffs of Wimereux there stands a hotel, the Hotel de Golf, a red, rambling building in the centre of a small brood of smaller erections like a hen among her chickens, open to all the winds that blow, a place to resort to when getting well is the chief object in life. Last summer it was filled with people in this condition; this winter it is still full, and for the same reason, but the circumstances are different.

On August 29 a train stopped on the line which runs through the station at, which served formerly for the transport of bricks and mortar. From it there descended 120 men and women, who brought with them drawn bags and bundles. They took that hotel in hand and made it, in the space of a few hours, literally, a hospital in good truth. Now it is known as the "A. V. H.," the Australian Voluntary Hospital, a triumph of overseas enterprise and inventiveness.

It is in keeping with the tradition of vigor and ready resource which is so much the pride, while the qualities are characteristic of our overseas cousins that within twelve hours of the arrival of the train aforementioned there were 117 stretcher cases being treated in the new hospital, which had been in the meantime cleared, cleaned, fitted and furnished from the first bedstead to the last towel. The authorities would have made no complaint had they taken a week over the business. What the Australians lacked they made or invented. An operating theatre was, of course, needed. The most suitable room having been decided on, it was a question of workmen to transform it. There were none. The men were busy lifting and carrying, so three sisters rolled up their sleeves and "turned to" themselves. They scraped every inch of paper off the walls at a rate which would have caused a paperhanger pain. Then the tallest sister of the three mounted on an improvised scaffold and manipulated the whitewash brush. A case for the instruments was improvised from an exhibition case for chocolates which had formed part of the hotel fixtures, and still does duty. It was the spirit which enabled men to make homes out of nothing in virgin forests and construct smiling paradises with wilderness as the sole material.

In the first seven days of the theatre's existence 79 serious operations were performed in it. But other marvels were performed in the twelve hours. Even the X-ray apparatus was installed and working, in charge of Mr. Herschel Harris, whose work in this department has been one of the chief factors in the great success which the Australian hospital has achieved. He invented one day a simple apparatus which has proved of the utmost value in examining X-ray negatives. It is a box, one side of which consists of a ground-glass screen illuminated from within by an electric lamp. It is portable, so that while the surgeon is operating he can refer to the X-ray negative of the part on which he is at work. The screen is large enough for three large negatives to be examined at once.

The building was not a large one, but so skilfully has the space been employed that 186 cases can be comfortably accommodated under normal circumstances. Indeed, I was assured that if it were necessary to take another 50 the thing would be done. And it did not seem possible to doubt it. As it is, the hospital will soon be enlarged by the erection of an annex close by. The staff, which numbers 120, including 36 nursing sisters, is accommodated in a building apart, so that once the spell of duty over there is a complete change of atmosphere and environment available. The doctors are housed in the golf clubhouse a few hundred yards away, and is placed the bacteriological laboratory, for there is nothing which this wonderfully equipped hospital lacks. Such a laboratory, about which alone an article might be written, is almost indispensable to a "war hospital" for testing for such terrors as those of tetanus, gangrene, enteric, the latter being one of the most important diseases to diagnose. It is one of the discoveries in a bacteriological laboratory that gangrenous wounds must be treated by being kept open, because the bacillus is anaerobic, that is to say, it cannot live in air, so stitches are now taboo, and the wound, swabbed with hydrogen peroxide, and irrigated with sterile or saline solution, is kept open till the bacilli have been destroyed. The bacteriological laboratory will show at once whether a wound is infected or not, and with what, and the treatment is determined accordingly. As regards the outside equipment of the hospital there are available nearly fifty motor ambulances.

AUSTRALIANS ALL.

The personnel is almost entirely Australian. The medical staff all volunteered at a meeting of Australian Journals who were in London when the war broke out. The commanding officer is Lieut.-Col. Fiaschi, who carried out the organization of the hospital, his second being Lieut.-Col. Herne. Both officers hold their commissions in Australia in the Royal Army Medical Corps. The medical staff consists of Sir Alexander MacCormick, Mr. T. Thring, and Major Dick. All the nursing sisters, with a few exceptions, are Australians, and it is in keeping with the general spirit which pervades the "A. V. H." that some of them actually paid their own fares from Australia to come and offer their services; and they all work with splendid energy, which may be imagined from the fact that on one occasion work went on continuously in the operating theatre from 6 o'clock one morning till 2 a.m. on the following day.

The whole installation of the hospital shows signs of this business-like, efficient disposition, coupled, of course, with that pioneer ingenuity of the Colonial. Here is a new splint which permits of the dressing of a wound without the necessity of removing the splint, there is a simple apparatus for the extension of a wounded arm. "If you haven't got a thing, invent it," seems to be the motto, and in war surgery so many unusual situations arise that the faculty is of sevenfold value.

As the staff and methods are Australian, so is the money, the donations have been on a generous scale, and this is only one of the respects in which the Australian hospital is in the very first flight of the many voluntary institutions which are doing such yeoman service.

THE REAL KITCHENER.

In studying Lord Kitchener one has to get rid of the legendary Kitchener and try to reconstruct the real man. The silent sphinx, the emotionless machine, the harsh and heartless commander, all these picturesque phrases which have been applied to Lord Kitchener, sometimes by graphic friends and sometimes by virulent foes, are absolutely misleading.

Lord Kitchener, doubtless, like all great men of action, can keep his own counsel, but the silent sphinx when met at a dinner party is eager to talk, and talks admirably, with a certain terseness as of a man of action, but not without imagination and wit, great insight. When he is in the intimacy of his own room at night and with only a few friends or two he can talk the whole evening through, and nobody thinks of interrupting the stream of interesting reminiscence and shrewd comment.

The emotionless machine has, as a matter of fact, plenty of emotion, though well under restraint, and the harsh and heartless commander is considerate to subordinates, scarcely says a hard word, never utters a harsh comment behind anybody's back, and often has distinguished [illegible] subordinates, [illegible] He speaks their language, understands their nature, sympathizes with their wrongs, is indulgent to their weaknesses, and works incessantly for their spiritual and material elevation.

This man, who has fought such tremendous and historic battles and [illegible]

That cold and [illegible] Kitchener, [illegible] This is [illegible] of his extraordinary success and universal popularity in Egypt. Lord Cromer was a great Egyptian ruler, and his services are imperishable and gigantic, but Lord Cromer was the stern, solitary and inaccessible bureaucrat who worked innumerable hours every day at his desk, never learned the Arabic language and possibly never quite grasped Arab nature.

Lord Kitchener is the cadi under the tree. The mayor or the citizens of the little Arab village can come to him, and the old soldier, and even the fellow, alone; and they will find Lord Kitchener ready to listen and to talk to them in their own tongue, to enter with gusto into the pettiest details of their daily and squalid lives, and ready also to apply the remedy to such or to supply such help as he can.—T. GUNS CAUSED QUAKE?

Cannonading in North Said to be Responsible for Italian Disaster.

"That the so-called concussions caused by the explosion of projectiles fired from the heavy guns on the Franco-German and German-Russian-Austrian border are probably the underlying cause of the recent earthquake in Italy is the opinion of Dr. Alois Kashlin, formerly professor of chemistry at the University of Italy and now consulting chemist for a large New Jersey corporation.

"It is a well-known principle generally accepted by scientists that concussion of any kind produces waves similar to those created by the wireless apparatus," said Dr. Kashlin. [illegible] was felt within a radius of 700 miles. Roughly speaking, the distance between Avezzano and the scenes of the heavy artillery shooting is between 1,000 and 1,500 miles. But this distance has nothing to do with the radius of the shock vibrations, which, up to a certain point, are felt more distinctly at a distance than they are at the place where the concussion originate.

For instance: I happened to be in West Point at the time of a naval review in the harbor of New York some time ago, when the fleet steamed in review before the President. Each ship fired the prescribed Presidential salute. The vibrations caused by the concussions from the firing of the heavy guns was hardly felt in New York city, but atop the rocky hill at West Point the shocks were felt very distinctly.

"The same experience may be observed in Union hill, the rocky continuation of the Palisades, when the heavy coast artillery guns at Sandy Hook are fired. The shocks are scarcely perceptible in New York, but they frequently rattle the windows in Union hill and neighborhood."

Dr. Kashlin thinks that further earthquakes are very likely in Italy in the near future, because the concussion of the immense 42-centimeter German howitzers is greater than ever before produced by man-made machinery and the effects upon the naturally sensitive subterranean construction of the Italian peninsula will be far-reaching.—New York Tribune.

Raleigh Out-Raleighed.

The youthful Walter Raleigh spreading his velvet cloak on a muddy walk for his queen to pass is a pleasant historical picture. But the heart of a courteous gentleman may beat under the blouse of a working man as well as under the cloak of a courtier.

Last November a city out west was cut off from the outer world by the worst storm of winter and sleet and snow in its history. Traction lines and railways were tied up for several days. Four days after the storm a woman reached the city to visit her sister. She knew that the cars were not yet running on the line she wished to take, and so she took a car on another line that would take her to the city limits, where she hoped to connect with a car that would take her where she wanted to go.

Forty minutes later she stepped from the car at the edge of the city. Between her and the curbstone a wide stream of water six or eight inches deep was running. As she looked helplessly about a working man whose hair was touched with grey left a group on the sidewalk, waded out to her, and said, "Madam, you don't know me, and I don't know you, but if you'll let me, I'll be glad to help you to the sidewalk." She thanked him, and he took her suitcase to the curb, splashed back, and taking her up in his arms, waded with her to the walk. There he put her down dry shod, carried her suitcase into a neighboring store, and told her that he would tell her when her car came; for he was also waiting for it.

Two hours later he waded with the suitcase to the long-delayed car, returned, and splashed once more through the stream of melting snow as he carried her to the step. Then he said, "I hope you'll be all right," and took a place at the opposite end of the car.—Weekly Scotsman.

Check the First Sign of a Cold
By Using
DR. WOOD'S
NORWAY PINE SYRUP.

A cold, if neglected, will sooner or later develop into some sort of lung trouble, so we would advise you that on the first sign of a cold or cough you get rid of it immediately. For this purpose we know of nothing better than Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup. This preparation has been on the market for the past twenty-five years, and those who have used it have nothing but words of praise for its efficacy.

Mrs. D. D. Gill, Tracy, N.B., writes: "[illegible] I developed an awful cold [illegible] it would turn into [illegible] I could not sleep nights, [illegible] A friend [illegible] told me of your [illegible] Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup. NERVES WERE BAD
Hands Would Tremble So She Could Not Hold Paper to Read.

When the nerves become shaky the whole system seems to become unstrung and a general feeling of collapse occurs, as the heart works in sympathy with the nerve.

Mrs. Wm. Weaver, Shallow Lake, Ont., writes: "I doctored for a year, for my heart and nerves, with three different doctors, but they did not seem to know what was the matter with me. My nerves got so bad at last that I could not hold a paper in my hands to read, the way they trembled. I gave up doctoring thinking I could not get well. A lady living a few doors from me advised me to try a box of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. I did so, and I am thankful to say for doing so, for I am strong, and doing my own work without help."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50 cents per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Don't Stay Deaf Any Longer — Follow the Procession — Use Catarrhozone.

Nine cases in ten of dull hearing are curable.

By curable we don't mean relievable—we mean that the sense of hearing can be permanently brought back.

Catarrh usually causes the deafness.

Cure the catarrhal condition and you remove the cause of your poor hearing.

If you were sure you had catarrhal deafness you would use a real cure at once—of course you would.

There is a cure for you—one that is inexpensive—pleasant to use—and sure to do its work thoroughly.

Catarrhozone is no experiment for deafness.

Thousands before you have cleared Catarrh out of their heads by the aid of Catarrhozone and have thereby been cured of deafness.

No batteries or miniature telephones to bother you—no internal medicine to take—you have simply to follow special directions for the Catarrhozone inhaler. Do this and you'll find a wonderful improvement in short order.

Any druggist can supply you Catarrhozone, or you can for $1 secure it post paid under plain wrapper from the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

FARM AND GARDEN

WINTERING BROOD SOWS.

Contrary to the general opinion the pig is one of the cleanest of animals under favorable surroundings. It never litters its house if it is possible not to do so. Since this is true it should be encouraged to follow its natural instincts through the medium of clean and sanitary environments.

The New Jersey Agricultural Experiment Station at New Brunswick, N. J., in its attempts to find a plan of wintering brood sows which would provide not only for the proper exercise of the sow but also for clean and sanitary surroundings, has adopted the colony house method. The colony house which is an "A" shaped structure, cheap and simple of construction, can easily be moved from place to place, is easily kept clean and provides warm and comfortable winter quarters for the sow. By placing these houses at the far end of a field and compelling the sows to come twice daily to the other end of the field for their feed otherwise inactive sows get the exercise essential to the production of larger, stronger litters of pigs in the spring.

At the New Jersey station additional protection is afforded the sows by surrounding the colony houses on the north side with a wind break of cornstalks, straw or other available material. This break is placed about three feet to the rear of the house and consists of a frame work of wire fence filled in to about one-half the height of the house with the materials suggested.

The colony house has two openings; one a door at the front to enable the sows to go in and out; the other, a door in the rear, hinged at the top, which may be raised to admit sunlight or for ventilation. This door is intended also to afford a convenient means of getting at the sow at farrowing time. In extremely cold weather, when the doors must be kept closed, the problem of ventilation is solved by a small window covered with canvas, which is located in the rear just below the apex of the roof.

The plan followed at the New Jersey station is to keep about three sows which are bred for spring farrowing in each colony house, the number of depending chiefly on the size of the sows. Three houses are placed side by side and anywhere from eight to ten sows taken care of in the group. It has been found that when kept in these houses disease is less apt to break out among the animals, and if it does occur it is much more readily controlled and kept from spreading.

As farrowing time approaches each sow is put in a separate house, which is placed in a separate lot also. This is necessary for several reasons. When two sows are together and one is farrowing her pigs are liable to be destroyed by the other one. The first sow may become excited at the presence of another and trample her own pigs. It often happens also that two sows under these conditions will fight each other, injuring or killing the pigs in their movements. The practice is to isolate the sow a week before she is due to farrow.

When pigs are a week old two sows which have previously been together may be assigned to the same field or pen, but separate houses should be used until the pigs are weaned.

Where a sow is to farrow in March the New Jersey station has found it advisable, in addition to providing a dry floor, to hang a lantern from the ridge pole at farrowing time and at night until the pigs are several days old. These precautions are taken to avoid the chilling and hence weakening of the young pigs. For late spring, summer or early fall farrowing a floor is not necessary. Hogs naturally seek a ground floor during those seasons, as it is cooler.

Great care is used to keep the houses clean and healthful. Clean bedding is placed in them as often as needed. They should be disinfected with some reliable disinfectant before turning sows in for the winter, and especially at farrowing time in the spring. In general the New Jersey station recommends disinfecting about once every three months with a 2 per cent. creolin solution or other compounds of creosote; with air slaked lime, whitewash, chloride of lime, crude carbolic acid or other commercial disinfectant. The [illegible] houses should be cleaned out occasionally in the winter, air slaked lime applied and new bedding laid down.

The New Jersey station figures the cost of one of its colony houses, including lumber and with home labor, at $10. Inasmuch as the houses last indefinitely with a little care and can be moved around at will, their cost cannot be considered exorbitant. Both sows and hogs can be handled with greater convenience and more cheaply through the utilization of the colony house.

NOTES.

The Pennsylvania Experiment Station concludes, as the result of tests, that the amount of silage fed to the breeding ewes should be limited to two pounds daily per head. Experiments at this station give proof that feeding corn silage as a sole roughage is fatal to pregnant ewes in a high percentage of cases. For that reason, conclude the experimenters, it should be fed in conjunction with other roughages, as alfalfa or clover hay, allowing two pounds as a maximum amount of corn silage to be fed to the pregnant ewe. Feeding of spoiled silage often causes death of lambs.

The cause of yellow leaf of sour cherries in June is given by one of the Cornell experts as fungus gaining entrance three weeks before the yellow spots disappear. It must be fought by a preventive spray of three or four applications of Bordeaux mixture.

Winter vetch is used at all the experiment stations. Twenty pounds to the acre are sown with oats in preference to barley. Vetch is preferred to clover because the little hairy sprouts cover the ground better and it is believed to take less moisture from the ground.

The young colt is easily handled and remembers all you teach him as long as he lives.

You should plan to have a better garden this year than you did last year. Plant on generous lines. Plan that the rows may be straight and long, so as to admit horse cultivation. See that there is nothing in the garden but vegetables; fruit trees have no place in the garden; they belong in the orchard. Nothing larger than currant or gooseberry bushes should be allowed a place in the garden, and these should be placed to one side of the garden and in long rows.

Field peas sown at the rate of two bushels per acre with one bushel of oats are now largely used by dairymen. The combination is cut just when the peas begin to pod and used as a hay. It is the cheapest feed that can be raised, and means a big increase in milk and butter fat. Furthermore, it leaves the soil in good condition for another crop, as the peas gather nitrogen out of the air and store it in the ground for the next crop.

PICTURESQUE ICE FIELDS.

Scenic Beauties of Uncle Sam's Glacier National Park.

That the ice fields of Glacier National Park present some of the best examples of active glaciers now found in the United States, is a statement made by W. C. Alden in a Government pamphlet. "They have a splendid setting in magnificent alpine scenery," says Mr. Alden, "unsurpassed in grandeur anywhere. Hidden away in the recesses of the mighty mountain ranges, these rare and wonderful features form a climax to many of the interesting trips open to the tourist.

"There are in the park about ninety small glaciers, ranging in size from Blackfeet glacier, with its three square miles of ice, down to masses but a few acres in extent, yet exhibiting the characteristics of true glaciers.

"After examining these features one can easily picture to himself as he looks down the valleys the great rivers of ice which in ages past cascaded from the cliffs below the upper cirques, converging as tributaries from the many branch valleys and united in great trunk glaciers. In imagination he can see these great glaciers, many hundreds of feet in depth, filling the great mountain valleys from side to side and deploying thence upon the bordering plains. He seems to see those mighty engines plucking away the rock ribs of the mountains, smoothing, grinding and polishing the irregularities and sweeping away the debris to be spread on the plains below. These glaciers developed and extended three miles, and, after each development, the congested masses melted away on the return of milder climatic conditions, until at length only the small cliff glaciers of the present day are left lurking in the protected recesses at the heads of the capacious valleys.

"Many of the rock walled amphitheatres are no longer occupied by ice, but from all there issues streams fed by the melting snow or ice. These plunge over the cliffs in beautiful, foaming cascades, and rush on down the mountain gorges. The melting glaciers left many inclosed basins, large and small, and in these the waters rest awhile, and mirror in their crystal depths the dark green of the surrounding forests, the rich colors of the rugged mountain walls and the deep blue of the cloud-flecked sky. On, again, from lake to lake, the waters flow and finally start down their long courses to the sea to merge at length with the chill waters of Hudson Bay, the balmy tides of the Gulf of Mexico or the rolling billows of the Pacific."

For You—a wonderful Book on Farm Drainage—FREE!

Do you know you can take as much crop off 100 acres properly drained as you can off 200 acres not drained and save half the labor?

It's a fact. Do you know that proper, inexpensive tile drainage assists pulverization—lengthens the season—prevents surface washing—makes your land lighter to work—prevents drought and increases the quantity and improves the quality of your crops?

Why not have us send you, today, free of charge, a very interesting booklet on this subject? Much to learn—nothing to pay. Don't neglect anything that will help you grow better, bigger crops. Proper drainage means as much as two dollars in your bank account for every one that goes there now, and the Government lends you money for the tile if desired.

FIRST AID FOR WEAK DIGESTION

Like Nearly Every Trouble Afflicting Mankind is Indigestion Due to Poor Blood.

Almost everybody experiences times when the organs of digestion show painful signs of weakness. Some slight disturbance of the health starts the trouble; then the patient takes a dislike to food, and dull, heavy pains in the abdomen give warning that the stomach is unable to do its proper work. Sometimes a false craving for food arises, if this is satisfied the result is additional torture—flatulence, a drowsy depression, sick headache and nausea are common signs of indigestion. The foolish practice of taking drastic weakening purgatives at such time should be avoided. Indigestion arises from stomach weakness and the only effectual method of curing the trouble is to strengthen the feeble organs of digestion by supplying them with richer, purer blood. This is the true tonic treatment by which nature's method Dr. Williams' Pink Pills achieve great results. These pills make the rich, red blood needed to strengthen the stomach, thus imparting a healthy appetite and curing indigestion and other stomach disorders. Mr. Thomas Johnson, Remford, N. S., says: "For five years I was a great sufferer from indigestion which wrecked me physically. I suffered so much that for days at a time I could not attend to my business. I had smothering spells so bad at times that I was afraid to lie down. I doctored and tried many medicines, but with no benefit. I saw Dr. Williams' Pink Pills advertised to cure this trouble and decided to try them. I had not been taking them long before I found that I had at last hit upon the right medicine. The improvement in my health was gradual, and after I had used ten or twelve boxes I could eat and digest all kinds of food, and I felt physically better than I had done for years. I shall never cease to praise Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for they proved a real blessing to me."

You can get these pills from any dealer in medicine or by mail at 50 cents a box or 6 boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE POULTRY WORLD

HEALTH OF BREEDING FOWL.

At this season among the breeders the question of the day is fertility of the breeders who are to make or mar the future output of the 1915 hatch. To many beginning poultry operations the question of fertility enters but little in their minds, and with the common idea of just mating a given number of females with a male will give them eggs that will have fertility to properly incubate, hatch and afterward rear a fine lot of chicks as good, if not better, than the parent stock. Yet, even with the old breeders, this obtaining of fertile eggs in the unnatural season is a problem, one that many factors enter into, and one that each year requires study and the attention of small essentials that to the average beginner seems of no importance.

Not all breeders handle the breeders in the same manner, and under the slightly different system seem to have a fair measure of success; but with all those that have had success in this line the foundation is very near the same. Health is the first important step. No fowl should be retained in the breeding pen, male or female, that has not, or is not, in good health. It requires nerve to discard a good fowl because of ill health, or one that has been ill and through doctoral efforts has recovered. But the safe way is to discard all that have not a clean bill of health for the future success of the flock.

Hens in good conditions mated to well-matured cockerels will give the best average results in the majority of cases, although well-matured, early-hatched pullets mated to strong cock birds will give good results. The number of females to each male for best results depends largely upon the breed, condition of birds and environment. One male to twelve or fifteen hens is the general rule with the lighter breeds early in the season, such as Leghorns, etc. With more experienced breeders one male to six or eight is the rule with Plymouth Rocks, Orpingtons and Rhode Island Reds, increasing the number as spring approaches.

To obtain the best fertility forced egg production must be avoided, and the fowls made to exercise for a number of hours during the day in a litter of straw. Pullets can be fed more liberally than hens. With the latter there is apt to be a tendency to put on too much fat for best results. In many cases the dry mash is kept from the hens, and only a variety of grains fed. Others open the mash hoppers during the afternoon only, allowing the hens to consume all they wish during this period. These systems of feeding depend largely on the condition of the fowls. All must have enough to eat to maintain heat, and for the making of the eggs, but the overfeeding of the breeding pen is one evil that many indulge in at the expense of strong fertility, especially during the early part of the year, when everything is confined to the poultry buildings a large part of the time. Male birds should be watched carefully. They go into the breeding yards in perfect condition, but especially it with hens will not consume their share of food, and in course of time become poor in flesh. A little extra grain should be taken and extra feed provided for such males to keep them in proper condition.

It is well to have an extra male to place in such breeding yards, unless a special mating is desired. In such case the one male will be compelled to stay in the pen. Green feed in the form of sprouted oats, cabbage and beets must be supplied, fresh water, oyster shell, charcoal and grit always before them, and a careful watch each day that the pen is getting the required amount of feed and exercise. They cannot, for best results, be handled in the same manner that the regular layers are, and the extra care and attention will mean better and stronger fertility.

NOTES.

There is no one best breed or variety. Money and pleasure can be derived from any of the popular breeds of today. The success with them lies wholly in the proper management of the fowls. Nearly all the standard-bred fowls can be made good egg producers by safe and sane breeding. One is more apt to succeed with the fowls they admire most, than to try and be successful with some breed known for its productiveness which they do not admire.

The early chick is a profit payer in the majority of cases. But the poultry keeper must have proper brooding quarters to successfully rear the chicks. There are many days in the early spring that are cold and wet, and chicks during spells of bad weather must have good quarters.

Pull together, progressive poultry keepers, it pays. There are just as many [illegible] cults under the name of utility as there is in the fancy, and the best in the main is just a higher art in poultry breeding. No real progressive fancier will neglect utility qualities in his flock. The one that does will not long stay at the top of the heap.

Breeding from stock from late-hatched pullets that were forced for egg production during the winter has been one cause for poor fertility and still poorer hatching results, and the chicks hatched did not show the thrift of those hatched from properly aged and cared for breeding stock. One cannot be too careful in the handling of future breeders, one of the main props to successful poultry.

PATENT MEDICINE

Protest Against the Government's War Tax.

This month's Montreal Pharmaceutical Journal contains the following editorial protesting against the Dominion Government's plan of raising taxes for the sale of patent medicines. The article is well worth perusal:

Two very important meetings have just taken place in Montreal — the Wholesale Drug Association of Canada and the Proprietary Trade Association of Canada. These meetings were both held for the purpose of considering the war taxes proposed, and which very seriously affect both the manufacturers of medicine and perfumes and the traffic of the distributors — the wholesale druggists. A general meeting of the retail druggists has been called and will take place this week. A reconsideration has been asked of the Government and a deputation will present the views of the trades interested at an early date.

The objections to the new measure of taxation as voiced in these meetings with unanimity are several in number. The tax proposed, it was shown amounted to from 15 to 40 per cent. on the usual trade selling prices. The tax being imposed on the price of sale at retail to the public represented on that basis of calculation from 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. No other business or industry was taxed to any such extent, and many important lines would actually face ruin if the measure was persisted in by the Government.

Instead of yielding for the war a large amount the prohibitory nature of the tax would defeat the object sought and ruin [illegible] and legitimate business enterprises in manufacturing.

The Ministry of Finance will be approached on the basis of asking investigation in detail, it being claimed that the treatment of the manufacturers and dealers as well in the branch affected, is unfair and unjust. The goods involved, it can be shown cannot stand any such charge, and also have already been taxed for the same purpose in respect to all the crude material employed in manufacturing and producing same.

The general tariff advance of 7½ per cent. applies to the ingredients used and as well also certain advances enacted last year at the "War Session" of Parliament. Alcohol is one important item with many manufacturers who have to bear the Inland Revenue tax of $3.96 per gallon on spirits. In principle it cannot be held as just to tax one and the same article under several headings. It is a tax on the poor and sick. The manufacturers cannot bear it on goods that can continue in sale—medicines are the poor man's doctor. This attribute of proprietary medicine was recognized by the Government of the United States only recently. Perfumes were taxed by stamp, but medicines were struck from the proposed tax list in recent revenue measure brought about through the present war affecting the income of that Government. It is hoped the Government will reconsider, and it is confidently expected this will be the case if the Minister will look into the details available, which demonstrate that an injustice is being done by the action proposed, and which cannot have had mature or careful consideration by the officers of department recommending.

Ostrich Feather Plucking.

During the course of the sitting of the Dominions Royal Commission at Port Elizabeth, the question of the supposed cruelty attending the plucking of ostrich feathers, as affecting the market, was raised, when a witness, Mr. Evans, stated that while in London he delivered a lecture with lantern slides showing the method of plucking. After the lecture a lady told him she had not bought feathers for three years on account of the cruelty she supposed was involved in the plucking, but after the explanation which had been given, she expressed her intention to purchase some next day.

THE PROPHECY OF BROTHER JOHANNES

Latin prophecy made by Brother Johannes in the year 1600. It has been deciphered and issued in the "Figaro." France is represented by a Cock, England a Leopard, Prussia a white eagle, Germany a Black Eagle, Austria the other Eagle, while the Lamb stands for Justice, Mercy and Truth.

Towards the year 2,000 the Antichrist will manifest himself. His army will surpass in numbers all that can be imagined. There will be Christians, Mahometans and savage soldiers among the defenders of the lamb. For the first time the lamb will be all red. There will not be a single spot in the Christian world that will not be red, and the heavens and earth, sea and air, will be red, for blood will flow in the elements at once.

The Black Eagle will throw himself on the Cock, who will lose many feathers, but will strike back heroically with his spurs. He soon would be crushed were it not for the Leopard and its claws. The Black Eagle will come from the country of Luther, and will surprise the Cock from another side, and will invade the country of the Cock up to the middle of it. The White Eagle from the north will surprise the Black Eagle, and will invade the country of the Antichrist from one end to another.

The Black Eagle will see himself forced to liberate the Cock in order to fight the White Eagle, and the Cock will pursue the Black Eagle into the country of the Antichrist to help the White Eagle. The battles fought up to then will be as nothing compared to those that take place in the country of Luther, for the seven angels will together pour in the fire of their censers on the hapless earth, which signifies that the Lamb will order the extermination of the race of the Antichrist. When the beast sees that he is lost, he will become furious, and for many months the beak of the White Eagle, and the claws of the Leopard and the spurs of the cock will furiously strike at him. They will cross rivers over the bodies of the slain, and these in places will change the course of the waters. They will bury only the men of noble family and leading commanders and princes, because the carnage made by the armies will be joined by the wholesale death of those who will die of hunger and pest. The Antichrist will ask many times for peace, but the seven angels who walk in front of the lamb have declared that victory will only be granted on the condition that the Antichrist be crushed like straw on the barn floor. The executors of the justice of the lamb cannot stop fighting as long as the Antichrist possesses soldiers to fight against them. That which makes the degree of the Lamb so implacable is that the Antichrist has pretended to be a follower of the Christ and to act in His name, and if he does not perish the fruit of the Redeemer would be lost, and the doors of Hades would prevail against the Saviour. The fight that will take place when the Antichrist forces his arms will be in many ways a human fight. (This may have reference to Essen, where the Krupp works are or at Westphalia.)

The three animals defending the Lamb will exterminate the last army of the Antichrist, but they will be forced to erect on the battlefield a pyre as large as a city, for the bodies of the dead will change the aspect of the countryside, as there will be mounds of the slain. The Antichrist will lose his crown, and will die in solitude and madness. His Empire will be divided into 22 states, but none will any longer possess fortresses, armies or vessels. (This number coincides with the number of German states now.) The White Eagle by the Order of St. Michael, will drive the Crescent from Europe and will instal him at Constantinople.

Then will begin an era of peace and prosperity for the earth, and there will be no more wars, each nation being governed according to its desires, and living according to the rules of justice. There will no longer be Lutherans or Schismatics. The Lamb will reign, and supreme happiness of humanity will begin. Happy those who, escaping the perils of the period, will be able to enjoy the fruit of the reign of the spirit and the purging of humanity, which can only come after the defeat of the Antichrist.

From Hook to Frying Pan.

"Positively the freshest caught fish I ever ate," said an ardent fisherman, "was one I caught in the wilds of Canada.

"A friend of mine and I were out with a canoe and a light outfit for two weeks trout fishing. About late one afternoon we struck a likely looking stream, made camp for the night and went to fishing. In half an hour we had our pockets full of trout.

"Then we rolled a couple of stones together, started a fire and put on the frying pan. While my friend was busy with that I said to him that I guessed I'd catch a fish or two more while he was cooking.

"In half a minute I felt a half pound trout. I swung the fish out and over him, where he stood by the fire, for him to look at.

"'Hold him so for a minute,' my friend says to me, and I did just over his head.

"'You know there's a way of cleaning a fish by which you remove its head and entrails practically at a touch, and my friend knew how. He reached up with his knife to that fish dangling over his head and nicked it in the right spot at the back of its head and then in front at the gills, and then he just drew the head and interior fittings away all at once, leaving the fish perfectly cleaned, and then, while it was still dripping with the water, from which I had caught it, he dropped this trout in the frying pan.

"You couldn't have fish much fresher caught than that, do you think?"—New York Sun.

Ages Show Man Changes Little.

Though it is conceivable that mankind may have spread from a common centre over the entire earth in a few thousand years, Professor Arthur Keith in a Birmingham university lecture has pointed out that the discoveries of the last fifty years clearly indicate that the dispersion and separation into widely separated races has not been a rapid process. The inhabitants of the lower Nile valley, though immigrants have arrived among them, show clearly persistence of the old types for 8,000 years. The permanence of human types has also shown in America, and a human skeleton of Lansing, Kan., found at a depth of twenty three feet in a glacial deposit, probably dates back 12,000 years. The men of England of 5,000 years ago had the modern stature, with the form of head and strength of muscle of many men of today. Professor Keith declared that his audiences had representatives of the men of the Derbyshire cave. In America the red Indian preserves the form of men who lived before the last glacial invasion, and the predynastic Egyptian survives in tribes on the Red Sea.—New York Press.

Law at Ascot.

Ascot is legal as well as royal in being the only racecourse in the world with its especial court of justice. When George IV. was regent he was assaulted at Ascot and when his assailant was arrested demanded his instant punishment. Enraged at the delay necessitated by the man's conveyance to Windsor, the prince decreed that a magistrate should always be in attendance at Ascot for the swift punishment of offenders. The indictable offender out of this made the royal wish the law of the land, and during Ascot week the chief magistrate at Bow street is accordingly on duty in the little room adjoining the paddock, to try and to sentence all offenders within a minute or two of their arrest.—London [illegible].

Quick Help For Chest Soreness! All Congestion Made To Go Quickly!

Worst Cold or Sore Throat Cured In Quick Order.

RUB ON NERVILINE

Rub Nerviline plentifully over the neck and chest—rub it in well. Lots of rubbing can't hurt. The relief will be surprising.

Nerviline is effective because it is powerful—about five times stronger than an ordinary liniment. Nerviline is penetrating, sinks in through the tissues, gets right in where the soreness and congestion really are. Its action is marvellously soothing. Rubbed on at night, it draws out the inflammation, and before morning takes away that feeling of tightness, and stops the cough entirely.

Where can you find as [illegible] a relief as Nerviline for a bad cold? Search the world over and you'll discover nothing half as good.

For nearly forty years Nerviline has been quickly curing colds, coughs and throat troubles. Thousands use it for rheumatism, sciatica, and neuralgia—they all speak well of this grand family liniment, because they have proved its almost magical power.

Whenever you have an ache or pain, be it neuralgia, [illegible], joint or muscle [illegible], remember that Nerviline is the quickest, surest cure. Every good dealer in medicine sells the large 50c family size bottle of Nerviline, trial size 25c. or [illegible] from the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

PATRIOTISM and PRODUCTION

Complete Your Plans Now

The important thing now is to complete at once your plan for the year's work—for increased production. By planning well in advance, each month's operations can be carried through more effectively when the time comes. Delays later on, through neglect of this, will mean loss to you and to the Empire.

Use the Best Seed

This year, for the sake of the Empire, farmers should be exceptionally careful in the selection of seed. Cheap seed is often the dearest. If every Canadian farmer would use only the best varieties, and sow on properly cultivated soil, the grain output of Canadian farms would be doubled. Deal only with reliable seedsmen. Write at once to Canadian Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, and to your Provincial Agricultural Department for information as to the best varieties of seed to be used in your particular locality, and use no others.

ATTEND YOUR CONFERENCE

Clean Your Seed

All grain intended for seed should be thoroughly cleaned and selected to retain only the strong kernels. You can reap only what you sow. It does not pay to sow weeds. Clean seed means larger crops and helps to keep the land clean. When you have your seed grain ready, put it through the cleaner once more.

Test Your Seed

Test your seed for vitality, too. Seed is not always as good as it looks. For example, oats, quite normal in appearance and weight, may be so badly damaged by frost that their value for seed is completely destroyed. If you have any doubt as to the quality of your seed a sample may be sent free to the seed laboratory at Ottawa, or Calgary, for test. But in most cases this simple test will prove sufficient:—

Take a saucer and two pieces of blotting paper. Place seed between blotting papers. Keep moist and in a warm place. In a few days, you will be able to see whether the vitality is there. Neglect to test your seed may mean the loss of crop.

The Farm Labour Problem

The Government suggests the forming of an active committee in every town and city, composed of town and country men and women. This committee would find out the sort of help the farmers of their locality need, and get a list of the unemployed in their town or city, who are suitable for farm labour. With this information, the committee would be in a good position to get the right man for the right place.

Councils, both rural and urban, Boards of Trade and other organizations could advantageously finance such work. Every unemployed man in the town or city who is placed on the farm becomes immediately a producer, instead of a mere consumer and a civic expense.

Increase Your Live Stock

Breeding stock are today Canada's most valuable asset. The one outstanding feature of the world's farming is that there will soon be a great shortage of meat supplies. Save your breeding stock. Plan to increase your live stock. Europe and the United States as well as Canada will pay higher prices for beef, mutton and bacon in the very near future. Do not sacrifice now. Remember that live stock is the only basis for prosperous agriculture. You are farming not speculating.

Application To Parliament.

Notice is hereby given that an application will be made by the Corporation of the town of Walkerton to the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario at the next ensuing session thereof for an act to consolidate the outstanding debenture and other indebtedness of the said town at the rate of $41,000, and authorizing and empowering the Corporation to raise by way of loan the said sum of $41,000 on the credit of its debentures to be issued under the authority of the said act.

That the said debentures shall be payable within thirty years after the issue thereof and shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent per annum as the said council shall determine. The existing debenture debt of the said town of Walkerton is as follows: and no portion thereof is in arrears:—

Former consolidated debt	$ 10575 72
Sewers	4907 11
Waterworks	13796 08
General Improvement	7510 20
Bonus Loans	1096 38
Public Library	1612 10
Floating debt	1821 39
	$41000 00

The reason for requiring the consolidation of the said debenture debt and for the issue of such debentures is to enable a reduction to be made in the sums to be raised annually for the repayment of the said debt and to enable the Corporation to pay off its floating indebtedness, which was incurred in executing works of a permanent and necessary character.

ASK EXTREME MEASURES.

At a mass meeting of temperance workers of London in Dundas Centre Methodist church Wednesday night a resolution was adopted calling upon the Dominion Government to immediately suspend all licenses for the manufacture of alcoholic beverages as a means to the conservation of grain, the prohibition in question to remain operative until the close of the war. Another resolution called upon the Ontario Government to cancel all bar, shop and club licenses until the end of the war.

HEY, RUBE'

Waal, there ain't nothin' like travelin' fer edukatin' a feller's brain box. Ef a man wasn't never to travel he'd never know no hin' nohow. Now take me. I never knew a blessed thing till I started to travel. Yes, sure, I heard about this here rube carnival yesterday, an' I sez to myself sez I, by heck! I'm goin' to see these here Walker on rubes ef it costs me all of 75 cents. Our folks lives at Cargill, all of 8 miles from Walkerton, an' I wouldn't like to eggsagerat, but I'll bet I've been there on the cars nigh onto 3 times in 7 year. Gosh! talk ebout travellin' I guess that's goin' some. I've got now that I know darn near every conductor on the railroad. Pap an maw come down to the deepo to see me off, an' I tell you maw felt pesky bad, an' she cried all fired. But pop he sez, "Let the dern fool go ef he wants to. Likely as not he'll get smashed up or lost, we don't care if he do. Waal, I got on the train an' the conductor he comes right up to me an' sez: "Waal, Rube whar be you goin'?" I sez. "How'd you know my name be Rube?" He sez, "I guest it." "Then," sez I "Guess whar I'm goin'." Some hot comeback, wasn't it? Waal, we got to Walkerton, an' by gosh I tell she's some town. I must have walked around fer all of 20 minutes before I got back to where I started, then I seed a feller I thought was Cy Parkins, an' he come up to an' sez, "Hello, Rube?" I sez, "Hello, yourself." An' he sez, "Hello" again. I guess he thought I wuz a telephone. "Goin' to the carn-i-val?" sez he: "Your right" sez I. "Come on" sez he "You'll get the first prize." Waal, sir, I goes along with the feller an' we got to a barn with ice on the floor, an' by gosh there must'er been nigh onto 300 people in there, I guess all the people in Walkerton wuz in that there barn. Some of them had their store close on but lots of em was dressed just like they had come from work. One little girl she toke my eye she did, an' I goes up an' asks her for a skate. She told me her name wuz Sis Hopkins, an' by heck they give her the prize fer bein' the best looking girl at the carn-i-val. They'd races to, I pretty near beat a feller named Pleskey, but I fell down the first time round or else I might've won. Anyway he got the prize, tho everybody sez I wuz the best skater. A kid named Small won another race, I could have beet him only I went round the wrong way. A girl called Norma Tough got another prize. She looked tough alright to, I guess that's why they gave it to her. I think they was givin' prizes to everyone only me. A feller named Sillers got another. They didn't give me nothin'. There was a big hockey match too, between the Fluffy Ruffles and the Sufferyet. Gee, but it sure was a game! Them girls can play hockey. The Ruffles won by 2-2. Waal, I come right away after the game an' I tell yer I wuz a big man round home after bein' in society like that, so I thought, Mr. Editor, I weed tell yer all about it.

THE WINNING SOLDIERS.

Victory through the grace of God
O'er Death and Hell and Sin,
Soldiers of the Cross of Christ,
Assuredly shall win.
Their Captain keeps them faithful,
And doth their strength increase.
Onward they move in triumph
And gain Eternal peace.
Against the powers of darkness
The armies of the Lord
Equipt with royal armour,
The Spirit and Word.
Thus fitted for the battle,
No foe can them withstand,
They struggle in the conflict
And gain Emmanuel's Land.
Then clothed in robes of whiteness,
And crowns of glory given,
They praise the name of Jesus
Forever more in Heaven.
And with the ransomed nations,
Redeemed from every zone,
They blend their songs with Angles
Before Jehovah's Throne.

This amount represents the collections, donations and moneys raised in various ways for this work since the organization of the local society.

Curling

In the second round of the senior skip competition for the Cargill trophy F. W. Lippert defeated I. H. McNamara by one shot and A. Collins won from A. E. McNab by seven. This leaves Collins and Lippert to play the finals and these games will be arranged as soon as weather permits. The junior skips have been chosen and will play for the gold medal this week. The local curlers expect to conclude this season's playing with games with Mildmay and Durham.

Death of Mrs. Muter.

After a long illness, death came on Wednesday morning to Mrs. Muter, who has during the past two years been living with her daughter, Mrs G. Schwindt. The deceased was 68 years of age. She was a resident of Hanover for a great many years and the remains are being taken to that town today (Thursday) for burial. Mrs Schwindt has the sympathy of many friends in her bereavement.

Is Recovering.

Last week we reported the serious illness of Mr William Ferguson who was recently brought to his home here from Niagara Falls. Contrary to the report which reached us, Mr. Ferguson is not suffering from consumption of the bowels, but has adhesions, which disease is not so dangerous, and from which, his father, Chief Ferguson, we are pleased to report, informs us that he is recovering.

Sneaking Young Men.

We have been informed that two of our young men make a practice of sneaking around and peeking in bedroom windows when people are retiring. Perhaps they are not aware of the seriousness of their act. We would warn them to be very careful in the future, as the parties are known and if we here of any further trouble their names will be published and they will be handed over to the authorities to be dealt with.

Already in England.

Part of the second Canadian Overseas Expeditionary Force is already in England having left Canada quietly on February 22nd and arrived safely in England some days later. No announcement was made of the sailing by the press until the troops had landed on British soil. These men were mostly from Toronto and Quebec. It is expected that the remainder of the contingent will sail shortly as every preparation has been made at London and Toronto for breaking camp at a moment's notice.

Presentation and Address.

On Wednesday evening of last week Mrs. L. C. Benton entertained the members of the choir of the Methodist church at the Soldier's Aid Tea Room. A dainty tea was served and a pleasant time enjoyed. The choir made use of the occasion to present Mr. N. Critchison the choir leader who is soon to leave for Berlin, and Mr. Langham who departs soon for the old land with complimentary addresses and suitably engraved umbrellas. A hearty vote of thanks was presented by Rev. Mr. Walker and Mrs. Skeleton, to Mr. and Mrs. Benton for their kindness and hospitality.

Indecent Assault Charge.

Chief Ferguson was in Mildmay and surrounding district on Saturday last serving summonses in connection with a police court case. This was another indecent assault case, the defendant being, Mr. Schmidt, a cattle buyer of Mildmay, the information being laid against him by Miss Aggie Harrison, daughter of a farmer residing near that village. The hearing of the charge was set for Monday afternoon, but on arriving here an amicable settlement was arrived at by the parties without a trial, the defendant paying all costs.

Transformer Burned Out.

During the removal of several trees at the Methodist parsonage on Saturday last, one of them in falling came in contact with the wires of the Walkerton Electric Light and Power Co., breaking them, and making a short circuit which resulted in the burning out of one of their large transformers. As a result of this, a section of the town was in darkness on Saturday night. Mr. Pengelly, the caretaker who was felling the trees, attributes the accident to the high wind which forced the tree in the opposite direction to which it should naturally have fallen, but the company claim it was the result of carelessness, as Mr. Pengelly had been warned with regard to the danger some time previous to the accident, and they will in all probability ask the church for damages sustained which are placed at between three and four hundred dollars.

Piano Tuning.

D. C. Wilson, piano tuner will be in Walkerton about the 15th, of March. Orders may be left with Mr. Robt. Richardson or Mr. Eli Myles.

The Irony of It!

Some time ago a Board of Trade was organized in Walkerton, for the purpose of furthering the interests of the town in industrial matters and also to advocate the 'Keep the Dollar at Home' slogan. In these matters and particularly the latter, they had the local papers behind them and the press devoted column after column of their space in endeavoring to educate Walkertonians to deal with the home merchant and forget the big mail order house. Imagine then the discomfiture of the local editor on being handed an item to be published gratis, written on Board of Trade stationery which was printed in an out of town office! The irony of it has almost made the Walkerton printers weep. Boo! hoo!!

Moving to Farm.

Mr. Frank Rennie is a firm believer in the "back to the land" movement, and is not only advocating it, but is about to put into practice that which he preaches, having decided to move from Walkerton to his excellent 150 acre farm in Brant, two miles west of town, and will move with his family to his new abode on Tuesday of next week. Mr. Rennie will complete his term as member of the town council, but in the future will be much missed in municipal affairs he having been a judicious and conscientious worker in the interests of the municipality while serving at the council board. What is Walkerton's loss, however, will be Brant's gain, for undoubtedly Mr. Rennie will become interested in the municipal affairs of the township and his many friends in Walkerton hope to see him rise to greater heights in township politics. Mr. Rennie has rented his residence on Victoria St. to Mr. Robt Irwin horse-buyer of Ripley, who will move here shortly.

TOWN COUNCIL.

The regular meeting of the town council was held on Monday evening. All members were present with the exception of Mayor Lippert who was on the sick list, Councillor Frank Rennie being chosen to occupy the chair of honor at the head of the table which he did very capably.

The usual number of accounts were submitted to the council, and these included one from the County of Bruce for some $2500.00 which was the town's share in the cost of adding the span to the west end bridge. The council decided to submit a by-law to the ratepayers, to extend the payment of this account over a period of twenty years.

The clerk was also instructed to prepare a by-law for the raising of $5000.00 which amount is to be expended in drilling wells and making the proposed extension to the waterworks system in the west ward. These by-laws will probably be combined in one and will be submitted to the people in April.

Tenders for oil to be used on the streets this year were received from all the leading Canadian Oil Co'ys, that of the Imperial Oil Company at 6c. per gallon being accepted. This is a reduction of about one cent per gallon on the price paid last year.

In connection with the street oiling blank petition forms are being printed for the use of the residents; and those who wish to have the street on which their property fronts, oiled, should secure one of these forms at as early date as possible. The council have also decided to pass a by-law under the Local Improvement Act calling for the annual oiling of Durham Street.

Mayor Lippert, Reeve McNab and Clerk Collins were appointed a committee to go to Toronto and interview the Legislature in connection with the consolidation of the town's debenture debt. The bill has received its first reading.

With regard to the water-works system, it was decided to place meters in the hotels, the Egg and Dairy and the brewery, the rate being fixed at 18c for the first 100,000 gallons, 15c for the second and 12c for each additional 100,000. This will considerably increase the revenue from this department. The council are also preparing to take all steps necessary during the coming spring and summer to prevent waste and conserve the town's water supply. The new electric pump has been installed and is now in operation at the pumping station and it is expected that the contractor will be here shortly and get the ground ready for drilling the first artesian well.

Council adjourned to meet on the 22nd., inst which will be a special meeting, held to introduce by-laws and transact other special business.

Notice!

[illegible] Ernest has bought out E. J. Skelton's coal business and in future will be pleased to have a trial order.

Don't Swear At Operator.

Discouragement to the use of indecent, blasphemous or insulting language over the telephone is contained in an amendment to the Telephone Act which will shortly be submitted to the Legislature through the Department of the Attorney-General upon the recommendation of the Ontario Railway Board. The amendment stipulates a fine of $25 or thirty days in jail for all cases where the use of such language over the telepeone is proven either between customers or from a customer to an operator.

Printers Defeated.

The Printers hockey team journeyed to Cargill on Friday last to play the return game with the Cargill team and after a strenuous three-period game the score stood 7-7. Overtime was decided upon and after an additional thirty-five minutes of play the Cargill boys, who are a fast septette, were declared the winners, the score standing 10-9 in their favor. Mr. Bob Loughleen was the referee. Each of these teams has won a game and weather permitting, the championship will be decided in Mildmay on Friday by a sudden death game which is now being arranged.

Wiarton in Finals.

The famous Wiarton hockey team are now playing in the finals of the O. H. A. with Orillia. The first game was played in the latter town on Friday 1st and resulted in the defeat of Wiarton by 5-1. The return game is in progress in Wiarton as we go to press Wednesday night. A special was run from Listowel to the northern town and quite a number of Walkertonians took advantage of the opportunity to see the final game for the silverware, driving to Hanover and catching the special there. A special train is also being run from Owen Sound. The admission fee for the game was 50c, 75, and $1.00.

~~Walkerton 6, Mount Forest 4.~~

The exhibition hockey match played between Mount Forest and Walkerton Northern League teams, at the rink here on Thursday night, resulted in a win for the locals by a score of 6-4. The attendance was not as large as was expected and the game was somewhat listless, lacking the aggressive playing and excitement which characterized the league games. The teams lined up:—

WALKERTON		MOUNT FOREST
La France	goal	Hinchy
Welch	r d	Murphy
Heffernan	l c	Murphy
Rife	r	Duffield

HOCKEY TOURNAMENT

A town hockey league was formed this week, with seven teams in the competition for the championship, viz:—Bankers, Bobbin Factory, Printers, Business College, Knechtels, High School, and the 'Chosen Seven' (?) The opening games of the series were played on Tuesday evening The first game being between the Bankers and Bobbin Factory and resulted in a win for the former by 4-3. The teams lined up:—

BANKERS		BOBBIN FACTORY
Taylor	goal	McGregor
Nairn	r d	Runstadtler
Hepburn	l d	Kain
Oberle	r	Weiler
Murray	l	Haas
Hutchison	l w	Kain
Lucas	r w	Farror

Referee—Heffernan.

The High School and Knechtel teams then took the ice and after a strenuous hour's contest the latter were worsted, the score standing 8-2 against them. The teams:—

KNECHTELS		HIGH SCHOOL
Olbrecht	goal	Rennie
Wallace	r d	Rowland
F. Schefter	l d	Moore
Bauman	r	Eidt
O. Schefter	c	Scanlon
Yack	l w	Wilson
Reinhardt	r w	Skelton

Referee—H. Runstadtler.

The last game, the Chosen Seven (?) opposing the Business College was probably the best of the evening as these two teams were considered to be comprised of better players. However the Chosen Seven (?) easily defeated the B. C., the score at full time standing 4-1 in their favor. The teams:—

CHOSEN SEVEN		BUSINESS COLLEGE
McCartney	goal	Patterson
Rife	r d	LaFrance
Welch	l d	Heffernan
Truax	r	Moloney
Russell	c	Oberle
McKay	l w	Henderson
Henderson	r w	Belden

Referee—C. Oberle.

This leaves four teams still in the running, the three winners of Tuesday night and the Printers and the games for the championship will be played this week.

Old Country News

DUCKS AS SENTRIES.

The famous geese of the Capitol at Rome have found these descendants in Belgium. Two Belgian officers are the authority for the story.

Beyond Pervyse, a difficult country flooded two miles wide, where the official communique has lately reported some progress, there is a lonely chateau. It is a valuable supporting point and post of observation, and although it stands right out in front of the present German lines and is commanded by the fire of the Belgian artillery, it is, or was a few days ago, still occupied by an outpost of about fifteen Germans. The walls of the house have been knocked flat by shells, but the Germans live in comparative safety in the cellars, being revictualled and relieved at night.

It may be imagined that the Belgians have spared no effort to take this isolated advanced post, so valuable a look-out to the enemy. Night after night bodies of Belgian infantry have crept stealthily out towards it, hoping to rush the chateau with the bayonet by surprise.

And every time they have been defeated—by a flock of ducks! The farmyard still contains a number of these birds, and though the Germans would no doubt greatly appreciate them as a dish, they find them more valuable as sentries than roasted, for they invariably detect the approach of the attacking party and begin to quack loudly.

The approaches to the farm being limited by the floods, the little German garrison, thus warned in the style of the old legend, have always been able hitherto to beat off the attack.

BRAVEST DEED OF YEAR.

The Stanhope gold medal for the bravest deed of the year was on Tuesday week awarded by the Royal Humane Society to Mr. Edward J. Hales, chief officer of the steamship Minerie, of the Andrew Weir Line.

On June 2 last the Minerie ran into a violent typhoon in the Sea of Japan. At the height of the storm an upturned fishing schooner was sighted with four men clinging to her. In spite of the storm the Minerie rescued them and learned that a woman was pinned under the wrecked boat.

Hales immediately took an axe and leaped into the wild sea. At last he reached the boat and, clambering on to it, hacked a great hole through the side, through which he pulled the exhausted woman.

When the Minerie attempted to lower a boat to pick up the rescuer and rescued a great gust of wind blew the boat out to sea. Hales and the woman whose life he had saved were forced to cling to the upturned boat for nearly an hour, with the waves breaking over them.

At last the sea calmed and a boat was lowered.

ANOTHER V. C. HERO HONOURED.

Lance-Corporal F. W. Dobson, of the 2nd Battalion Coldstream Guards, was received by the King at Buckingham Palace, when His Majesty personally invested him with the Victoria Cross, shook hands with him and complimented him upon the conspicuous gallantry which had won him the coveted decoration.

Lance-Corporal Dobson is in England on leave, and when it became known at the Palace that he was to be in London, the King desired to take the opportunity of pinning on the V. C. As an officer concerned put it, "They managed to catch Dobson." The lance-corporal was in mufti, but was hurried off to headquarters and supplied with full dress uniform, in which he was conducted to Buckingham Palace by two officers of the Coldstream Guards.

FOUR FRENCH ALLIES.

The wife of M. Debreuil gave birth to quadruplets at St. Hilaire-de-Court, Vendee, France, on Jan. 7. News received in London was that the mother and all four children have been saved.

In compliment to the allies, the father has named them

Raymond (M. Poincare).
Elizabeth (Queen of the Belgians).
George (King of England).
Alexandra (the Czarina).

"Four children at a birth is, of course, very rare indeed," a physician at one of the great London hospitals stated, "but as an incident it pales into insignificance beside the fact that all four little ones are alive almost a month after birth. There could be no more apropos or more graphic illustration of the virility of new France than this triumphant and simultaneous entrance into the world of Raymond, Elizabeth, George and Alexandra."

"CATCH-MY-PAL" RECRUITING.

An interesting scheme to stimulate recruiting was adopted by Lieut.-Col. Haley, commanding the 2nd Barnsley Battalion, on Monday. The men had a holiday, and then entered into healthy competition in a "catch-my-pal" crusade. Though the total result of the effort will not be known until to-day, up to last evening 30 recruits had been received, and the total strength of the battalion now exceeds 400.

MRS. HARRY PAYNE WHITNEY.

The Greek ideals of Isadora Duncan seem to have impressed themselves upon the modes of the season. Greek gowns made with tunic and cincture are the newest phase of fashion.

Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney of Vanderbilt fame, appeared at the opera recently in one of the new Greek gowns. It was made of bottle green velvet and it was sleeveless as the robe of Aspasia, and Greek bands on the bodice was its only trimming.

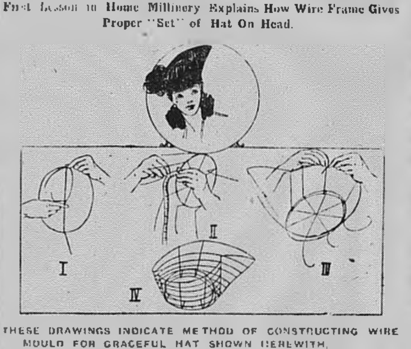
It's the Tilt of Your Hat That Tells, This Year

First Lesson in Home Millinery Explains How Wire Frame Gives Proper "Set" of Hat On Head.



THESE DRAWINGS INDICATE METHOD OF CONSTRUCTING WIRE MOULD FOR GRACEFUL HAT SHOWN HEREWITH.

(By Clarissa Chesley.)

You're ready for another hat, of course. Every woman wants something natty to tide over the time until Easter styles arrive.

But if you can't afford to buy a new hat, don't sit idly at home and wish for one to come drifting down on a snowflake. Why not try your hand at millinery? Start with the right materials, add brains and a little care, product: a smart late-winter chapeau!

A hat, like a house, depends largely on the foundation. You must make first of all a mould of wire. It is the [illegible] of the hat on the head which is extremely important in present styles, and to obtain the correct effect your wire frame should be carefully fitted.

Buy a bolt of frame wire and a pair of nippers. With a tape measure get the head size for your hat. Cut and fasten the wire with the nippers and then bend it so that it is a little longer than wide. For the average size head and worn in the prevailing style the hat will measure eight inches front to back and seven inches across.

Fasten a wire lengthwise from side to side and two more diagonally across to the foundation wire. The ends of all these wires are left quite long. As you work with these wires run your finger smoothly over each one to straighten it. This is very important as a means of keeping the shape accurate.

Bend back one inch on each wire. This bend starts the crown band (See Fig. 2.) A second wire is then tied around at this point.

The wire going around the edge of the brim of the hat pictured measures 36 1-2 inches. The loose wires are brought up to meet it and tied as in Fig. 3.

Directly in front the height measures 4 inches, at the back 5 1-2 inches, at the left side it is 6 1-2 inches, at the right side 2 3-4 inches. Of course, if this brim proves too high for becomingness it can be made a little narrower.

Where the dents in the brim are made and they can be done by placing the frame on the head and following the picture (Fig. 4) stay wires are run up and tied.

The frame cover, made of fine net or willow cloth, is formed on the wire mould. Directions for making it will be given in the next lesson.

Some Aids to Health

MENTAL HYGIENE.

In addition to the hardening of the body, the education of the child should include measures which increase the resistance of the child against pain and discomforts of various sorts.

Every child, therefore, should undergo a gradual process of "hardening" and be taught to bear with equanimity the pains and discomforts to which everyone sooner or later must be exposed.

What I have said about [illegible] cold baths, walking in all weather and at all temperatures, play and exercise in the open air, has a bearing on this point, for a child who has formed good habits in these various directions will have learned many lessons in the steeling of his mind to bear pain and to ignore small discomforts.

Physicians who work among nervous cases realize how often the child who has been too much protected from pain becomes the victim of nervous breakdown later in life.

The boy who learns to tumble in a gymnasium, to box and wrestle and keep his temper while engaging in these exercises will have subjected himself to a training which cannot help but stand him in good stead later on in life.

One reason why women are more prone in later life to nervousness than men lies in the lessened opportunities which girls have for bodily "hardening" in the games which they play and the life which they lead as children.

Particular care should be taken with young girls who show any tendency to nervousness to see to it that not too much concession is made to their likes and dislikes.

Nothing can be more harmful to them than the gratification of caprices.

Especially when a child shows a tendency to be annoyed by certain smells and tastes and to complain of fatigue or of sensitiveness to bright light, the family physician should be consulted and, provided no actual disease of the sense organs or brain is responsible, the process of "hardening" should at once be begun.

Neglected, it is surprising to what [illegible] such [illegible] may lead.

It takes very little time to satisfy the daily demands of your teeth and keep your mouth [illegible].

TEETH.

Poor teeth result in poor digestion, disturbance of the entire digestive tract.

No child whose teeth are not qualified to perform the function required of them can be normally healthy, since so much depends upon proper digestion and the assimilation of good food.

Clean teeth are essential for the [illegible] of the health.

Teeth should be examined regularly and carefully.

Watch for [illegible].

[illegible] have them cleaned by a dentist every three months. In after years a good set of teeth will bless the grown man or woman.

False teeth makers thrive on those who neglect their teeth in youth.

It has been said that [illegible] destroy teeth and [illegible] as the destruction of the teeth themselves is the bad effect on general health during and after the process of decay.

Says an authority: "Lack of care of the mouth and its appendages is prejudicial to health in several ways.

"In the first place, a decaying tooth is always a menace, and especially when undergoing abscess [illegible] low the gums. Ulcerations, pyorrhoea, or Riggs' disease, and other infections of the root of the teeth are difficult of access and treatment, and for this reason are always to be regarded as a dangerous condition.

"Aside from the pain and suffering which these diseases of the teeth produce, we must not forget the possibility of direct infection.

"So-called blood poisoning and death have been frequently the result of diseased teeth. Some forms of inflammatory rheumatism are thought to be caused by the infection of pyorrhoea, and in general the health is injured in proportion as the teeth are affected."

A good joke and a hearty laugh are often more effective than a pill in aiding digestion.

ASPIRIN.

Few drugs compare with aspirin in the extent to which the public abuse it.

While the percentage of deaths traceable to aspirin are low, they are low because of the fact that its harmful effects are seldom recognized by the physician.

Before the outbreak of the war in Europe, aspirin was used more extensively, perhaps, than any one drug and even at the present high prices, there is probably no one drug which is in greater demand by the general public.

Aspirin may have a bad effect on the cells and organs [illegible] to. Aspirin is bad for nervous persons and the reaction from a heavy dose weakens resistance.

Is aspirin, used so freely by the public, a menace?

Yes.

There is little question of the harm accomplished by the persistent use of the drug.

However, there is much disagreement regarding the specific amount of harm accomplished.

The use of aspirin may lead to complicated disorders varying to a greater or less degree upon the state of health and condition of the person using it.

Deaths of human beings traced to aspirin are few, though the suffering often caused by its use is well known.

"The [illegible] in the fact that it is only too frequently impure in itself, that is, aspirin is often contaminated with [illegible] or other drugs which do harm.

"The phenomenal use of aspirin is [illegible].

[illegible] under a doctor's order.

"It is interesting in this connection to know that [illegible] ounces of aspirin are sold in the United States annually.

"It is the [illegible] which the public needs protection.

"The reason for this adulteration lies in the fact that the market price of aspirin has risen steadily and this has called forth dangerous substitutes and ineffective articles.

"Pains resulting from fevers," says a well-known physician, "are but a [illegible] resulting from bad air."

"NEW DENTISTRY.

New dentistry [illegible] "modern dentistry" [illegible] the most talked of thing to-day in medical and dental circles.

"Modern dentistry is almost exclusively concerned with the teeth. It seeks to save a tooth even though it is in the form of a "dead" set of roots to which a crown may be anchored.

The "new dentistry," on the other hand, has to do with the teeth as they are in general health.

So far as concerns the treatment and restoration of teeth that have not been killed and are embedded in healthy tissue, the "new" and the "modern" dentistry are practically in accord.

Beyond that point the ways part. The modernist thence proceeds to "kill the nerves" and to cap or crown while the holder of the new idea extracts and puts in a bridge. The dental result is the same in the two cases so far as chewing food is concerned, but the new dentist insists that he has performed the greater service because he has not only restored the mechanical means of mastication, but has also removed a menace to general health in the shape of a dead root.

New dentistry is a new field of co-operation between the two branches of the healing art. The physician who believes in it may appeal to the dentist as an aid to diagnosis and in dental surgery and the dentist who practices it may call in the physician on occasion to supplement the dental treatment.

The new dentistry begins with the established fact that general health depends upon the ratio between good germs and bad germs in the blood.

The blood in this aspect is like an organized city government. It has good citizens and bad citizens. From among its good citizens there are selected certain elements as police to combat the bad citizens. Some of the bad citizens may be highway robbers, some safe-blowers, some burglars.

If the burglars suddenly become unusually active and the police concentrate their forces against them, the field is left relatively more open for the hold-up men and the safe-blowers to go as far as they like.

In the blood the policemen are "antibodies" or antidotes in common parlance.

They are called out to destroy "injurious" germs in proportion as those germs are numerous and active.

A sudden increase in bad germs of one sort may give those antibodies so much to do that the bad germs of another sort may take advantage of the situation to increase their activity and win a victory.

The new dentists, analyzing the blind abscess at the root of a tooth, a little-[illegible] of bad germs.

Everybody knows what an ulcerated tooth means, but the X-ray shows that in many cases there is an unsuspected abscess at the tooth roots.

It may have caused no local pain, but if it is there it is surely breeding bad germs which pass on into the blood imposing a strain upon the antibodies which may give other bad germs their opportunity.

Thus, the overload imposed upon the police forces of the blood by an abscessed tooth may lower the patient's resistance to a [illegible] in that [illegible] to disease.

Three generations ago, false teeth were very common. Old teeth made way for full sets of false teeth. Since this practice was superseded by the modern practice of retaining the old roots as anchors for crowns, there has been a remarkable increase in the modern diseases.

This is why the new dentist extracts and bridges in cases where the modern dentist puts a crown on the dead root.

Don't treat measles lightly. Its after effects are likely to be dangerous. Weakened lungs and disease of the ear often result from measles.

RESISTANCE.

Some have held that disease weeds out the race of undesirables. They claim that the race is stronger for the weeding out process. This view will hardly accord with the fact that many diseases choose the strong and then when afflicted with it the death rate among the strong is greater than among the weak.

Typhoid fever is such a disease.

The chances of exposure for young male adults are ten to one. It is a peculiar fact that with typhoid fever the strong man dies from the fight he puts up.

Fire is the best of disinfectants. Burn the waste that accumulates in the kitchen or about the house—then the disease germs can't spread.

Disinfect the Sickroom

Thorough cleansing and disinfecting of the sick room should take place before it is again occupied by children, and it should remain "open" at least two weeks. The best home disinfectant is sunshine and fresh air. Scrub, wash and wipe with soap and water and leave the windows and doors wide open, so the wind can have free play.

A long standing complaint—"[illegible] up front."

The Slow, Sluggish, Torpid Action of the Liver is Responsible for Many Ills.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills stimulate the sluggish liver, clean the coated tongue, sweeten the obnoxious breath, clear away all waste and poisonous matter from the system, and prevent as well as cure all complaints arising from a liver which has become inactive.

Mrs. Victor H. McNeills, Sand Point, Alta., writes: "I thought I would write and tell you of my experience with Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. [illegible] a friend of mine, from Toronto, [illegible] Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. He told me they had done him a great good for his stomach. I used several vials and I found they did me so much good that I can recommend them to anyone suffering from liver trouble."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Robbed By Law Of Eight Years

Two or three years ago by the confession of another prisoner a convict in the Western Pennsylvania Penitentiary was released after having served more than twenty years of a life sentence. He had been convicted of murdering a fellow workman during labor troubles in a big manufacturing establishment, and though loudly protesting his innocence a jury found him guilty.

During his imprisonment his wife died. He left the penitentiary penniless, but through the generosity of Andrew Carnegie he was sent back to his old home in Austria, a middle aged man, broken in health and not with kindly thoughts of the Government that had taken from him his liberty for half of his lifetime.

There was at the time considerable criticism of the State of Pennsylvania for not doing something to repair the injury it had done to an innocent man. New Jersey now has a similar case and there is considerable interest being manifested concerning the action the Legislature will take, if any.

Eight years ago a murder was committed at Califon, a Hunterdon county, and John E. Schuyler, a stone mason, was indicted for the crime. About the only basis for the indictment was the fact that he had several years before the murder quarrelled with and made threats against Manning Riley, the dead man. There was no other clue, and the Prosecutor of the Pleas, having convinced himself that Schuyler was guilty, set out to convince the jury.

This he did. Former Justice Alfred Reed, who presided at the trial, privately told his friends that he was not satisfied with the verdict, but the jury having brought in a verdict of guilty it remained for him to pass the death sentence. When a few weeks later a petition was sent to Gov. Stokes asking him to grant a respite Justice Reed informed the Governor of his doubt and as a result Schuyler's sentence was finally commuted to imprisonment for life.

Before this his day of execution had been twice fixed, and except for the two reprieves granted by Gov. Stokes Schuyler would have been the last man hanged in New Jersey. He escaped this distinction, but from January 29, 1907, until December 23, 1914, he was in jail or prison.

Now what will the State of New Jersey do for this innocent man who was deprived of his freedom for nearly eight years? There was always a doubt as to his guilt; but the doubt was removed more than two years ago, when Frank Burd, a prisoner in the Hunterdon county jail, told his jailer that he and not Schuyler had killed Riley.

Even then nobody seemed to interest himself in the prisoner, until a local newspaper published a statement that a [illegible] was current that Burd had [illegible], and demanded that something be done to set at rest the rumor. The story was verified by the Sheriff and Judge Richard S. Kuhl, but when Burd found that he might place his own life in jeopardy by sticking to his confession he repudiated it.

Then Constable Joseph McConnell undertook to corroborate the story that Burd told his jailer, and after five months' work succeeded in doing so. When he placed his evidence before Burd the latter renewed his confession. Then a number of influential [illegible] became interested and [illegible] by a new Grand Jury.

In the meantime Burd had been sent to State prison for carrying concealed weapons. When he was assured that any confession he might make would not be used against him, he made affidavit to the truth of his original story, for which abundant corroboration had been found.

For some reason Prosecutor Large was anxious that Schuyler should be hanged. Whether it was prejudice or professional pride has never been explained; but as he was a young practitioner at the time of the trial the belief is that he entertained the average prosecutor's desire to convict, and had worked himself into the belief that Schuyler was guilty.

GOT AID OF PASTOR.

At any rate, when the case was pending before the Court of Pardons seven years ago Prosecutor Large wrote to the Rev. Baker T. Smith, pastor of the Fox Hill Presbyterian Church, urging him to arouse the citizens living adjacent to the scene of the murder to demand that Schuyler be executed. Then the State witnessed the strange spectacle of a delegation of "church people" coming to Trenton to demand of Gov. Stokes that the Court of Pardons keep its hands off and that the death penalty be inflicted upon the condemned man.

Last September twenty-seven newspaper owners signed Schuyler's application for a pardon on the ground that he was innocent and that another had confessed to the crime. Former Governor Stokes, who twice granted reprieves, also signed, and Justice Reed wrote to the Court of Pardons, declaring his doubt of Schuyler's guilt and asserting that he had so informed the court when it ordered [illegible] sentence commuted to life imprisonment in 1907.

Even now Schuyler would probably be in prison and the Burd confession entirely ignored but for the interest of a young Philadelphia reporter who attended the trial and was convinced that the purely circumstantial evidence produced, and there was nothing else, was by no means conclusive of guilt. He it was who induced the newspaper publishers to sign the petition for pardon, he it was who met Schuyler when he was set free, just before Christmas, and he will find employment for the released man.

Schuyler has been making a calculation of his financial losses since his arrest and finds that they amount to $13,010. He had $1,000 in the bank at the time he was arrested and owned a house on which there was a mortgage. The money was spent in his defense; the mortgage was foreclosed and $1,500 equity in the house went; he borrowed $1,000 to pay his lawyers; spent $500 in his efforts to regain his liberty; lost $250 worth of tools and he could have earned $8,640 working at his trade as stone mason during the time he was in prison, at least that is what was paid to the man who took his place.

The State of New Jersey cannot pay him for the suffering he endured, for the loss of eight years of liberty, for the anguish of mind when he learned that his wife had died and a sister had gone insane while he was in prison; for the suffering and humiliation of his daughter, but it can make good his money loss.

Old Country News

DUCKS AS SENTRIES.

The famous geese of the Capitol at Rome have found these descendants in Belgium. Two Belgian officers are the authority for the story.

Beyond Pervyse, a difficult country flooded two miles wide, where the official communique has lately reported some progress—there is a lonely chateau. It is a valuable supporting point and post of observation, and although it stands right out in front of the present German lines and is commanded by the fire of the Belgian artillery, it is, or was a few days ago, still occupied by an outpost of about fifteen Germans. The walls of the house have been knocked flat by shells, but the Germans live in comparative safety in the cellars, being revictualled and relieved at night.

It may be imagined that the Belgians have spared no effort to take this isolated advanced post, so valuable a look-out to the enemy. Night after night bodies of Belgian infantry have crept stealthily out towards it, hoping to rush the chateau with the bayonet by surprise.

And every time they have been defeated—by a flock of ducks! The farmyard still contains a number of these birds, and though the Germans would no doubt greatly appreciate them as a dish, they find them more valuable as sentries than roasted, for they invariably detect the approach of the attacking party and begin to quack loudly.

The approaches to the farm being limited by the floods, the little German garrison, thus warned in the style of the old legend, have always been able hitherto to beat off the attack.

BRAVEST DEED OF YEAR.

The Stanhope gold medal for the bravest deed of the year was on Tuesday week awarded by the Royal Humane Society to Mr. Edward J. Hales, chief officer of the steamship Minerle, of the Andrew Weir Line.

On June 3 last the Minerle ran into a violent typhoon in the Sea of Japan. At the height of the storm an upturned fishing schooner was sighted with four men clinging to her. In spite of the storm the Minerle rescued them and learned that a woman was pinned under the wrecked boat.

Hales immediately took an axe and leaped into the wild sea. At last he reached the boat and, clambering on to it, hacked a great hole through the side, through which he pulled the exhausted woman.

When the Minerle attempted to lower a boat to pick up the rescuer and rescued a great gust of wind blew the boat out to sea. Hales and the woman whose life he had saved were forced to cling to the upturned boat for nearly an hour, with the waves breaking over them.

At last the sea calmed and a boat was lowered.

ANOTHER V. C. HERO HONORED.

Lance-Corporal F. W. Dobson, of the 2nd Battalion Coldstream Guards, was received by the King at Buckingham Palace, when His Majesty personally invested him with the Victoria Cross, shook hands with him and complimented him upon the conspicuous gallantry which had won him the coveted decoration.

Lance-Corporal Dobson is in England on leave, and when it became known at the Palace that he was to be in London, the King desired to take the opportunity of pinning on the V. C. As an officer concerned put it, "They managed to catch Dobson." The lance-corporal was in mufti, but was hurried off to headquarters and supplied with full dress uniform, in which he was conducted to Buckingham Palace by two officers of the Coldstream Guards.

FOUR FRENCH ALLIES.

The wife of M. Debreuil gave birth to quadruplets at St.-Hilaire-de-Voust, Vendee, France, on Jan. 7. News received in London was that the mother and all four children have been saved.

In compliment to the allies, the father has named them

Raymond (M. Poincare),
Elizabeth (Queen of the Belgians),
George (King of England),
Alexandra (the Czarina).

"Four children at a birth is, of course, very rare indeed," a physician at one of the great London hospitals stated, "but as an incident it pales into insignificance beside the fact that all four little ones are alive almost a month after birth. There could be no more apropos or more graphic illustration of the virility of new France than this triumphant and simultaneous entrance into the world of Raymond, Elizabeth, George and Alexandra."

"CATCH-MY-PAL" RECRUITING.

An interesting scheme to stimulate recruiting was adopted by Lieut.-Col. Raley, commanding the 2nd Barnsley Battalion, on Monday. The men had a holiday, and then entered into healthy competition in a "catch-my-pal" crusade. Though the total result of the effort will not be known until to-day, up to last evening 36 recruits had been received, and the total strength of the battalion now exceeds 400.

Greek Simplicity Society Woman's Fad

MRS. HARRY PAYNE WHITNEY.

The Greek ideals of Isadora Duncan seem to have impressed themselves upon the modes of the season. Greek gowns made with tunic and cincture are the newest phase of fashion.

Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney of Vanderbilt lineage appeared at the opera recently in one of the new Greek gowns. It was made of bottle green velvet, and it was sleeveless as the robe of Aspasia, and Greek bands on the bodice was its only trimming.

YOU SHOULD BE AFRAID OF A COUGH OR COLD.

Coughs and colds do not call for a minute recital of symptoms as they are well known to everyone, but their dangers are not so well known. All the most serious affections of the throat, the lungs and the bronchial tubes are, in the beginning, but coughs and colds.

Many people when they contract a slight cold do not pay any attention to it, thinking perhaps that it will pass away in a day or two. The upshot is that before they know it, it has settled on their lungs.

Too much stress cannot be laid on the fact that on the first sign of a cough or cold it must be gotten rid of immediately, as failure to do this may cause years of suffering from serious lung trouble.

DR. WOOD'S NORWAY PINE SYRUP

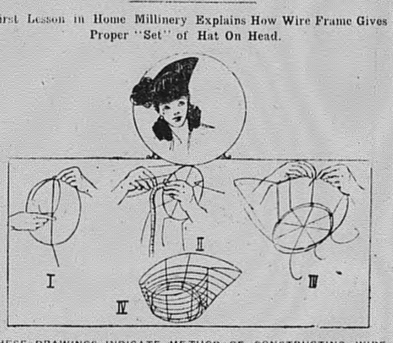
will cure the cough or cold and prevent it developing into some serious throat and lung trouble, such as bronchitis, pneumonia and consumption.

Mrs. D. C. Pence, Brighton, Ont., writes: "I am sending you my testimony of your Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, telling you what it did for my little girl. The doctor had given her up as she was, as we thought, going into a decline with the cough she had. I was told by a lady friend to try 'Dr. Wood's' and when she had taken two bottles she was on her feet again, and four bottles cured her."

Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup is the best cure for coughs and colds. It is put up in a yellow wrapper; three pine trees the trade mark; the price, 25c and 50c; manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

It's the Tilt of Your Hat That Tells, This Year

First Lesson in Home Millinery Explains How Wire Frame Gives Proper "Set" of Hat On Head.



THESE DRAWINGS INDICATE METHOD OF CONSTRUCTING WIRE MOULD FOR GRACEFUL HAT SHOWN HEREWITH.

(By Clarissa Chesley.)

You're ready for another hat, of course. Every woman wants something natty to tide over the time until Easter styles arrive.

But if you can't afford to buy a new hat, don't sit idly at home and wish for one to come drifting down on a snowflake. Why not try your hand at millinery? Start with the right materials, add brains and a little care—product: a smart late-winter chapeau!

A hat, like a house, depends largely on the foundation. You must make first of all a mould of wire. It is the poise of the hat on the head which is primarily important in present styles, and to obtain the correct poise your wire frame should be carefully fitted.

Buy a bolt of frame wire and a pair of nippers. With a tape measure get the head size for your hat. Cut and fasten the wire with the nippers and then bend it so that it is a little longer than wide. For the average size head and worn in the prevailing style the hat will measure eight inches front to back and seven inches across.

Fasten a wire lengthwise from side to side and two more diagonally across to the foundation wire. The ends of all these wires are left quite long. As you work with these wires run your finger smoothly over each one to straighten it. This is very important as a means of keeping the shape accurate.

Bend back one inch on each wire. This bend starts the crown band. (See Fig. 2.) A second wire is then tied around at this point.

The wire going around the edge of the brim of the hat pictured measures 36 1-2 inches. The loose wires are brought up to meet it and tied as in Fig. 3.

Directly in front the height measures 4 inches, at the back 5 1-2 inches, at the left side it is 6 1-2 inches, at the right side 2 3-4 inches. Of course, if this brim proves too high for becomingness it can be made a little narrower.

Where the dents in the brim are made and this can be done by placing the frame on the head and following the picture (Fig. 4) stay wires are run up and tied.

The frame proper, made of rice net or willow cloth, is formed on the wire mould. Directions for making it will be given in the next lesson.

Some Aids to Health

MENTAL HYGIENE.

In addition to the hardening of the body, the education of the child should include measures which increase the resistance of the child against pain and discomforts of various sorts.

Every child, therefore, should undergo a gradual process of "hardening" and be taught to bear with equanimity the pain and discomfort to which everyone sooner or later cannot help be exposed.

What I have said about clothing, cold baths, walking in all weather and at all temperatures, play and exercise in the open air, has a bearing on this point, for a child who has formed good habits in these various directions will have learned many lessons in the steeling of his mind to bear pain and to ignore small discomforts.

Physicians who work among nervous cases realize how often the child who has been too much protected from pain becomes the victim of nervous breakdown later in life.

The boy who learns to tumble in a gymnasium, to box and wrestle and keep his temper while engaging in these exercises will have subjected himself to a training which cannot help but stand him in good stead later on in life.

One reason why women are more prone in later life to nervousness than men lies in the lessened opportunity which girls have for bodily "hardening" in the games which they play and the life which they lead as children.

Particular care should be taken with young girls who show any tendency to nervousness to see to it that not too much concession is made to their likes and dislikes.

Especially when a child shows a tendency to be nauseated by certain smells and tastes and to complain of noises or of sensitiveness to bright light, the family physician should be consulted and, provided no actual disease of the sense organs or brain is responsible, the process of "hardening" should at once be begun.

Neglected, it is surprising to what vagaries such hypersensitiveness may lead.

It takes very little time to satisfy the healthy demands of your body and keep your health—much less than is hopelessly lost when you are sick and unable to work.

TEETH.

Poor teeth will not masticate food properly.

No child whose teeth are not qualified to perform the function required of them can be normally healthy since so much depends upon proper digestion and the assimilation of good food.

Clean teeth are secured only by the regular use of the brush.

Teeth should be scrubbed regularly and carefully.

Watch for the slightest signs of decay.

When your teeth chip, see a dentist. Have a child's teeth minutely examined twice a year. Have them cleaned by a dentist every three months. In after years a good set of teeth will bless the grown man or woman.

It has been said that sweets—too much sugar—destroy teeth and hasten decay. But quite as important as the destruction of the teeth themselves is the bad effect on general health during and after the process of decay.

Says an authority: "Lack of care of the mouth and its appendages is prejudicial to health in several ways.

"In the first place, a decaying tooth is always a menace, and especially when the decaying process reaches below the gums. Ulcerations, pyorrhoea or Rigg's disease, and other infections of the root of the teeth are difficult of access and treatment, and for this reason are always to be regarded as a dangerous condition.

"Aside from the pain and suffering which these diseases of the teeth produce, we must not forget the possibility of direct infection.

"So-called blood poisoning and death have been frequently the result of diseased teeth. Some forms of inflammatory rheumatism are thought to be caused by the infection of pyorrhoea, and in general the health is injured in proportion as the teeth are affected."

ASPERIN.

While the percentage of deaths traceable to asperin are low, they are low because of the fact that its harmful effects are seldom recognized by the physician.

Before the outbreak of the war in Europe, asperin was used more extensively, perhaps, than any one drug and even at the present high prices, there is probably no one drug which is in greater demand by the general public.

Asperin may have a bad effect on the cells and organs connected with it. Asperin is bad for nervous persons and the reaction from a heavy dose weakens resistance.

Is asperin, used so freely by the public, a menace?

Yes.

There is little question of the harm accomplished by the persistent use of the drug.

However, there is much disagreement regarding the specific amount of harm accomplished.

The use of asperin may lead to complicated disorders varying in a greater or less degree upon the state of health and condition of the person using it.

Deaths of human beings traced to asperin are few, though the suffering often entailed by its use is well known.

The chief harm in the use of asperin lies in the fact that it is only too frequently impure in itself that is, asperin is often contaminated with acetanilide or other drugs which do harm.

The promiscuous use of asperin is dangerous.

Those who are afflicted with nervous ailments or heart weaknesses have no business using it at all unless under a doctor's orders.

It is interesting in this connection to know that 2,000,000 ounces of spurious asperin are sold in the United States annually.

It is this spurious article rather than pure asperin against which the public needs protection.

The reason for this adulteration lies in the fact that the market price of asperin has risen steadily and this has called for numerous substitutes and adulterated articles.

"Deaths resulting from fevers" says a well-known physician, "are but as a drop in the ocean to deaths resulting from bad air."

"NEW DENTISTRY."

"New dentistry" as distinguished from "modern dentistry" is perhaps the most talked of thing to-day in medical and dental circles.

"Modern dentistry" is almost exclusively concerned with the teeth. It seeks to save a tooth even though it be in the form of a "dead" set of roots to which a crown may be anchored.

The "new dentistry" on the other hand, has to do with the teeth as factors in general health.

So far as concerns the treatment and restoration of teeth that have not been killed and are imbedded in healthy tissue, the "new" and the "modern" dentists are practically in accord.

Beyond that point the ways part. The modernist theorie proceeds to "kill the nerves" and to cap or crown while the holder of the new idea extracts and puts in a bridge. The dental result is the same in the two cases so far as chewing food is concerned, but the new dentist insists that he has performed the greater service because he has not only restored the mechanical means of mastication, but has also removed a menace to general health in the shape of a dead root.

The Slow, Sluggish, Torpid Action of the Liver is Responsible for Many Ills.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills stimulate the sluggish liver, clean the coated tongue, sweeten the obnoxious breath, clear away all waste and poisonous matter from the system, and prevent as well as cure all complaints arising from a liver which has become inactive.

Mr. Victor B. McNeills, Sandstone, Alta., writes: "I thought I would write and tell you of my experience with Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, as I am greatly pleased with the results I received by using them. I was troubled with sick headache for a long time, and would get so sleepy right after I ate my dinner that I could not do any work. A friend of mine, from Toronto, visited me last summer and he asked me to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. He told me they had done him so much good for his stomach. I used several vials, and I found they did me so much good that I can recommend them to any one suffering from liver trouble."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

New territory is a new field of co-operation between the two branches of the healing art. The physician who believes in it may appeal to the dentist as an aid in diagnosis and in dental surgery and the dentist who practices it may call in the physician on occasion to supplement the dental treatment.

The new dentistry begins with the established fact that general health depends upon the ratio between good germs and bad germs in the blood.

The blood in this aspect is like an organized city government. It has good citizens and bad citizens. From among its good citizens there are selected certain elements as police to combat the bad citizens. Some of the bad citizens may be highway robbers, some safe blowers, some burglars.

If the burglars suddenly become unusually active and the police concentrate their forces against them, the field is left relatively more open for the hold-up men and the safe blowers to go as far as they like.

They are called out to destroy injurious germs in proportion as these germs are numerous and active.

A sudden increase in bad germs of one sort may give these police so much to do that the bad germs of another sort may take advantage of the situation to increase their activity and win a victory.

The new dentistry emphasizes the blind abscess at the root of a tooth, a hitherto ignored breeding place of bad germs.

Everybody knows what an ulcerated tooth means, but the X-ray shows that in many cases there is an unsuspected abscess at the tooth roots.

It may have caused no local pain, but if it is there it is surely breeding bad germs which pass on into the blood imposing a strain upon the antibodies which may give other bad germs their opportunity.

Thus, the overload imposed upon the police forces of the blood by an abscessed tooth may lower the patient's resistance to a point where he becomes an easy prey to disease.

Three generations ago, false teeth were very common. Old teeth made way for full sets of false teeth. Since this practice was superceded by the modern practice of retaining the old roots as anchors for crowns, there has been a remarkable increase in the modern diseases.

This is why the new dentist extracts and bridges in cases where the modern dentist puts a crown on the dead root.

Don't treat measles lightly. Its after effects are likely to be dangerous. Weakened lungs and disease of the ear often result from measles.

RESISTANCE.

Some have held that disease weeds out the race of undesirables. They claim that the race is stronger for this weeding out process. This view will hardly accord with the fact that many diseases choose the strong and then when afflicted with it the death rate among the strong is greater than among the weak.

Typhoid fever is such a disease.

The chances of exposure for young male adults are ten to one. It is a peculiar fact that with typhoid fever the strong man dies from the fight he puts up!

Fire is the best of disinfectants. Burn the waste that accumulates in the kitchen or about the house—then the disease germs can't spread.

WINTER RAIN.

(Des Moines Register and Leader.)

Rain in winter comes with a very different spirit than does the rain of spring. It has been called sullen and slow. It does beat against the windows with a kind of soggy dreariness. It trickles from the sooty roofs and chimneys and slushes idly along the dingy snow banks.

But to anybody who likes the mere actuality of nature's processes, there is a gleam of promise even in winter rain. Old water courses are beginning to show their ways again through the retreating snow of February and the winter rain gurgles ecstatically down over the banks and into the furrows worn by ages of just such changing routine.

Matted dead leaves have been held quiet by the stern frost fingers and the winter rain loosens them and draws them into hollows where the violet roots are waiting for the softer showers of spring. Brown buds are swelling discreetly, wary of too open a heart to the blasts of February, but conscious of the mysterious pulse of life somewhere deep within.

To be sure, the sky glowers cold and dark, the chance lightning along the far horizon is abnormally garish over snowy meadows, and the wind dashes the falling spray about with sharply chilling force. But the sun gleams out through the harsh bluster, the sky laughs back with the same old blue. There is the lure of elemental vigor even in the winter rain.

Disinfect the Sickroom.

Thorough cleansing and disinfection of the sick room should be done before it is again occupied by children, and it should remain vacant at least two weeks. The best home disinfectant is sunshine and fresh air. Scrub woodwork and floors with soap and water and leave the windows and doors wide open, so the wind can have free play.

A long standing complaint—"Move up front."

Robbed By Law Of Eight Years

Two or three years ago by the confession of another prisoner a convict in the Western Pennsylvania Penitentiary was released after having served more than twenty years of a life sentence. He had been convicted of murdering a fellow workman during labor troubles in a big manufacturing establishment, and though loudly protesting his innocence a jury found him guilty.

During his imprisonment his wife died. He left the penitentiary penniless, but through the generosity of Andrew Carnegie he was sent back to his old home in Austria, a middle aged man, broken in health and not with kindly thoughts of the Government that had taken from him his liberty for half of his lifetime.

There was at the time considerable criticism of the State of Pennsylvania for not doing something to repair the injury it had done to an innocent man. New Jersey now has a similar case and there is considerable interest being manifested concerning the action the Legislature will take, if any.

Eight years ago a murder was committed at Califon, a Hunterdon county, and John E. Schuyler, a stone mason, was indicted for the crime. About the only basis for the indictment was the fact that he had several years before the murder quarrelled with and made threats against Manning Riley, the dead man. There was no other clue, and the Prosecutor of the Pleas, having convinced himself that Schuyler was guilty, set out to convince the jury.

This he did. Former Justice Alfred Reed, who presided at the trial, privately told his friends that he was not satisfied with the verdict, but the jury having brought in a verdict of guilty it remained for him to pass the death sentence. When a few weeks later a petition was sent to Gov. Stokes asking him to grant a respite Justice Reed informed the Governor of his doubt and as a result Schuyler's sentence was finally commuted to imprisonment for life.

Before this his day of execution had been twice fixed, and except for the two reprieves granted by Gov. Stokes Schuyler would have been the last man hanged in New Jersey. He escaped this distinction, but from January 29, 1907, until December 23, 1914, he was in jail or prison.

Now what will the State of New Jersey do for this innocent man who was deprived of his freedom for nearly eight years? There was always a doubt as to his guilt; but the doubt was removed more than two years ago, when Frank Burd, a prisoner in the Hunterdon county jail, told his jailer that he and not Schuyler had killed Riley.

Even then nobody seemed to interest himself in the prisoner, until a local newspaper published a statement that a rumor was current that Burd had confessed, and demanded that something be done to set at rest the rumor. The story was verified by the Sheriff and Judge Richard S. Kuhl, but when Burd found that he might place his own life in jeopardy by sticking to his confession he repudiated it.

Then Constable Joseph McConnell undertook to corroborate the story that Burd told his jailer, and after five months' work succeeded in doing so. When he placed his evidence before Burd the latter renewed his confession. Then a number of influential business men became interested and induced Gov. Fielder to order an official investigation by a new Grand Jury.

In the meantime Burd had been sent to State prison for carrying concealed weapons. When he was assured that any confession he might make would not be used against him, he made affidavit to the truth of his original story, for which abundant corroboration had been found.

For some reason Prosecutor Large was anxious that Schuyler should be hanged. Whether it was prejudice or professional pride has never been explained; but as he was a young practitioner at the time of the trial the belief is that he entertained the average prosecutor's desire to convict, and had worked himself into the belief that Schuyler was guilty.

GOT AID OF PASTOR.

At any rate, when the case was pending before the Court of Pardons seven years ago Prosecutor Large wrote to the Rev. Baker T. Smith, pastor of the Fox Hill Presbyterian Church, urging him to arouse the citizens living adjacent to the scene of the murder to demand that Schuyler be executed. Then the State witnessed the strange spectacle of a delegation of "church people" coming to Trenton to demand of Gov. Stokes that the Court of Pardons keep its hands off and that the death penalty be inflicted upon the condemned man.

Last September twenty-seven newspaper owners signed Schuyler's application for a pardon on the ground that he was innocent and that another had confessed to the crime. Former Governor Stokes, who twice granted reprieves, also signed, and Justice Reed wrote to the Court of Pardons, declaring his doubt of Schuyler's guilt and asserting that he had so informed the court when it ordered the death sentence commuted to life imprisonment in 1907.

Even now Schuyler would probably be in prison and the Burd confession entirely ignored but for the interest of a young Philadelphia reporter who attended the trial and was convinced that the purely circumstantial evidence produced, and there was nothing else, was by no means conclusive of guilt. He it was who induced the newspaper publishers to sign the petition for pardon; he it was who met Schuyler when he was set free, just before Christmas, and he will find employment for the released man.

Schuyler has been making a calculation of his financial losses since his arrest and finds that they amount to $12,010. He had $1,000 in the bank at the time he was arrested and owned a house on which there was a mortgage. The money was spent in his defence; the mortgage was foreclosed and $1,100 equity in the house went; he borrowed $1,050 to pay his lawyers; spent $700 in his efforts to regain his liberty; lost $250 worth of tools, and he could have earned $8,640 working at his trade as stone mason during the time he was in prison; at least that is what was paid to the man who took his place.

The State of New Jersey cannot pay him for the suffering he endured, for the loss of eight years of liberty, for the anguish of mind when he learned that his blind mother and a sister had died while he was in prison, for the suffering and humiliation of his daughter, but it can make good his money loss.

Smothering of Asthma Stops Quick Thousands Cured By "Catarrhozone"

Count Ten--Then Relief Comes From Chronic Asthma.

Catarrhozone is the one remedy that can be sent quickly and direct to all parts of the breathing apparatus.

The effect from Catarrhozone is a quick one—you feel better in no time—keep up the good work, use Catarrhozone as directed and you get well.

If your case is curable, if anything on earth can rid you permanently of Asthma, it will be Catarrhozone. It contains that strangely soothing and powerful antiseptic found in the Blue Gum Tree of Australia, and this is fortified by other germ-killing properties which, when so scientifically combined, make Catarrhozone a veritable specific for Asthma, Catarrh and Bronchitis.

Even though many other remedies have failed—even though you are discouraged and blue—cheer up and try Catarrhozone to-day. What it repeatedly has done for others it will surely not fail to accomplish for you.

Catarrhozone is not expensive. One dollar will buy a complete outfit from any druggist. The money will be well spent, because your immediate improvement in health will surpass your fondest expectations. Don't wait—to-day is the time to use Catarrhozone.

FARM AND GARDEN

ORCHARD SOIL; VINEYARD CULTURE.

Unless humus from some source is furnished the orchard, eventually there will be no trees. Without a sod, and with the removal each fall of the leaves from the ground, it would be only a question of time before the soil will refuse to do its best, even if commercial fertilizers are freely used.

Under such a system it is necessary to use large quantities of barnyard manure, or forest leaf-mound, to prevent deterioration of the soil.

In an orchard that is bare the trees are more readily weakened by cold than when surrounded by sod. Partially winter-killed trees are apt to be attacked by bark beetles, as dangerous a pest as San Jose scale.

It is important all unnecessary trash that has laid on the ground during the summer and fall, together with the leaves of such trees as are known from circumstances or past history to shelter numbers of pestiferous insects, should be destroyed.

Where a cover-crop is used it should be plowed under deeply in early spring, so that most of the insects hibernating above ground will be hopelessly buried and perish.

Where tillage is followed throughout the entire season, there is no objection to placing a straw mulch around the trees after the insects are safely hidden for the winter.

There should be clean culture in and around the vineyard. Remove splinters from posts, and rotten spots on posts and trellis, as well as clean up all fallen leaves and debris, both in and around the borders of the vineyard, for a considerable distance.

The soil should be stirred either very early in spring or very late in fall, so as to expose to the weather such worms as shelter themselves just below the surface soil or underneath clods. If no other insects except the grapeberry moth, the grape vine flea beatle and the grapevine leaf-hopper were present in the vineyard, clean culture and stirring the surface soil in late fall or early winter would be profitable.

The gouty gallmaker spends the winter as a larva in the gouty galls on the canes. Cut out and burn all galled canes in winter or spring. Any galls on wild vines in the neighborhood should be looked after in like manner to prevent subsequent infectation. The eggs of the tree crickets may be found inserted in the pith by splitting open the punctured canes. These punctures resemble, from the outside a closely-dotted line of pinholes, two or three inches long. Cut out and burn the punctured canes before spring. Several species of moths hibernate as pupae among the fallen leaves also some small beetles, some injurious plant bugs and some leafgall flies. Many of these will be destroyed if the leaves are collected and burned in early winter.

The imported currant borer is a clear-winged moth, closely related to the peach borer. It passes the winter as a caterpillar in the tunneled stem. The stalk is so weakened by the insect's work that it often breaks off quite readily in fall, winter and spring. Tunneled canes may be pruned out and burned any time between October and May, when they are not covered with snow. A little trial of shriveled stalks will usually discover if they are infested, because they break so readily when tunneled.

The native currant borer is a long-horned beetle, with habits very like those of the imported species, only several larvae usually work in the same cane instead of one. Treatment should be the same as for the preceding species.

The four-lined leaf bug lays its eggs in or near the end of branches in much the same manner as the tree cricket, hence burn all winter prunings.

The scurfy bark louse is common on currant and may be treated in late winter with lime-salt-sulphur wash or kerosene emulsion, diluted one to eight.

A number of pupae of currant-feeding caterpillars, as well as of some sawflies, hibernate among the leaves and trash on the ground; hence, clean culture is advisable, as in case of every other department of the garden.

FARMER A MANUFACTURER.

A pamphlet has been issued by the Central Experimental Farm entitled "The Farmer as a Manufacturer." It has been prepared by Mr. A. T. Stuart, B. A., Assistant Chemist, who has presented a number of simple illustrations of the chemical processes that take place in vegetable and animal life.

The processes are indicated by which the farmer, whose raw materials are but air, water and soil, is able to manufacture therefrom an apparently endless variety of products—both plant and animal. It is shown, however, that their composition is to be easily understood, consisting as they do of but four principal constituents. The nature of the raw materials, the process of manufacture and the products are discussed.

Under the heading "Maintaining Fertility" it is pointed out that "the farmer must exercise extreme care if he would keep his soil in the highest condition of productiveness. Soil is the real guardian of the farmer's capital, and the security is absolute. Try as he may he cannot "Break the bank." He may bring about temporary derangement and dividends may for awhile be suspended, but invariably under better management prosperity can be restored and perhaps even larger profits than ever secured.

The phamphlet, which Bulletin No. 20, of the Second Series, is available to those to whom the information is of interest, on application to the Publications Branch of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa.

CARE OF EWE AND LAMB.

The Live Stock Branch of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa has issued a very practical bulletin on "The Care of the Ewe and Lamb." It constitutes a shepherd's presentation of the details of management of the breeding flock, more particularly during the winter and spring months. It takes up, among other things, parturition, feeding, docking, castration, the raising of pet lambs, and the simple and more serious ailments and accidents met with in the ordinary flock, concluding with a series of paragraphs termed "Leaves From the Notebook of a Successful Shepherd."

The bulletin which is helpfully illustrated, was prepared by T. Reginald Arkell, who has charge of the Sheep and Goat Division of the Live Stock Branch. It is designated at Phamphlet No. 5 of the Live Stock Branch. Copies are available to those who apply for them to the Publication's Branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.

SHADE TREES.

A bulletin entitled "The Planting and Care of Shade Trees" has just been issued by the Central Experimental Farm.

This publication, which has been prepared by Mr. F. E. Buck, B. S. A., Assistant to the Dominion Horticulturist, contains practical directions and advice in the selection of shade trees, with notes on the principal injuries and unfavorable conditions to which shade trees are subjected especially in towns and cities. Lists of varieties suitable for street and home planting are also given.

This bulletin is No. 13 of the Second Series of the Central Experiment Farm, a copy of which will be mailed to those to application to the Publications Branch Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.

NOTES.

It is claimed that the age of the horse can be told by the skin of the cheek, by the ribs, by the shrinking of the flesh of the tail and by the teeth. In a young horse the skin of the cheek is soft and elastic and if raised up will immediately fly back in place. With an old horse however the skin is lifeless, and if it is raised up it will go back rather slowly. The ribs of an old horse are apparently farther apart and the space between them more distant than in a young horse. First the space between the last two ribs become more distant, then between the next two, and so on. In an old horse the flesh of the tail shrinks, making the joints more distant. This change begins at the end and works up year by year toward the body. These three methods are not accurate and merely enable one to tell an old horse from a young one. A skillful horseman can tell about as much regarding the age of a horse by the general appearance as by any of these methods.

The dairy cow is the hope of a poor-land farm. Her presence means increased fertility and greater profit for the farmer while the land is being built up. Every farmer with poor land should have cows, build silos, set pastures and plant crops to maintain the cows.

Some rather extensive observation were made at the Montanna Experiment Station relates to the feeding of smutty oat hay to cattle. During the winter of 189 a dairyman near Bozeman lost 12 cows. The animals had been receiving clover and alfalfa previous to being fed the oat hay. The oat field was so badly smutted that the owner thought it worthless for grain. He therefore cut the oats before they became ripe and stored the material for hay. Out of 20 cows which received but one feeding of this hay, 12 died within 18 hours with symptoms of gastric disturbance. The feeding of the oat hay was discontinued and as a result there was no further loss. The station concludes that experiences of this kind suggest the desirability of treatment of seed oats for smut and also serve as a warning to stockmen.

To supply the necessary protein in the dairy ration, the agricultural department of the University of Illinois used gluten meal at $20 per ton, instead of bran at $15. Not only did the cows hold their own, but the flow of milk was increased from one to three pounds per cow.

No one has yet discovered a sure cure for worms when once they get thoroughly established in a flock of sheep. About the best remedy known, as well as the surest preventive, lies along the line of frequent change in pasture. By a natural process of elimination, the sheep will become more or less free from worms if they are not so situated that they take them back into the system as rapidly as they eject them.

It is claimed that silage does not keep so well in cement, stone or brick silos as in those of wood, because cement conducts away the heat necessary to proper fermentation; also, being porous, it admits the air, which spoils silage. Thus quite a quantity is lost around the edges. Nothing is better, it is concluded than a round silo made of wooden staves.

Clean up the garden before winter and burn the rubbish. Don't compost it to use on the garden next year, as it probably contains plenty of pores of rot and other fungous diseases.

It is not generally known how much fertilizer a crop of apples, pears or grapes will remove from the soil. An acre of apples producing 300 barrels removes from the soil 24 pounds of nitrogen, two pounds of phosphoric acid and 24 pounds of potash, all valued at $5.74. An acre of pears yielding 335 bushels removes 18 pounds of nitrogen, five pounds of phosphoric acid and 14 pounds of potash, total value $3.60. Grapes harvesting 2,13[illegible] pounds per acre contain 13 pounds of nitrogen, five pounds of phosphoric acid, 22 pounds of potash, worth $3.61. Of peaches, this report is not complete, but the yield per acre is 285 bushels, containing eight pounds of phosphoric acid and 19 pounds of potash. These figures show plainly a preponderance of potash. Potash may be supplied in cottonseed hull ashes and wood ashes and bones and animal matter are also a valuable fruit fertilizer.

Feeding a little linseed meal occasionally to stock is beneficial, keeping the system regulated.

Truck crops suffer least from fungi in those seasons which open with a cool spring and end with a very hot summer with a rainfall below the average.

From experiments at the South Dakota station testing the relative value of several roughages as feeds for fattening lambs, it is concluded that the corn silage as a sole ration for lambs is not the best of feeds; that white sweet clover is an excellent roughage when fed with grain ration; that pea hay is a good roughage, and that alfalfa is very platable and highly neutritious feed for lambs. Shredded corn fodder fed with grain was less satisfactory.

A few years ago the cooking of feed for hogs was widely advocated, but this practice has hardly stood the test. There are few experienced hog feeders who will advise the extra expense incurred in preparing feed in this way. There can be no doubt that cooking of hard, dried corn renders it more digestible and enables the animal to get more of the nutritive material from it, but the increased labor and expense of cooking will more than offset this gain. It is cheaper and just as good to soak old corn or other grain than to cook it. In a few instances it might be profitable to cook feed for hogs, such as for sows after farrowing, for sick pigs, or pigs after weaning if the weather is cold. When there are a good many beculls, potatoes to be fed to hogs they will be improved if cooked, although it will not be necessary to fit up an expensive cooking outfit for this purpose. The greatest gain at the least expense and trouble is what every feeder is after.

If one horse will pull and the other will not, a horseman advises hitching the balky horse's inside trace across tongue to the inner end of the other horse's single tree. The balky horse will be forced to pull.

The Ohio station found that butter-fat could be produced nine cents cheaper per pound by using silage than when hay was used instead. A similar difference was found in milk production.

It is improper to catch a sheep by its wool. Butchers know what it means to the poor animal, for it leaves a black or blue mark or bruise on the carcass, which interferes with the sale of it. Catch a sheep either by the hind leg or by placing the hand under the jaw or neck. When using a crook aim to catch a sheep above the gambrel joint, as there is danger of injuring the leg when catching it below this joint.

Should there be quail in the vicinity, encourage them to lodge near you, and do all possible to prevent their destruction either by hunters or the elements. They are too valuable on a farm to be destroyed.

SPLITTING PAINS IN THE MUSCLES DRIVEN OUT QUICKLY BY "NERVILINE"

Rheumatic Pains Go—Suffering Ceases—Cure Comes in Even Chronic Cases.

For nerve-wracking twinges in the muscles, for torturing backache or lumbago, you'll find Nerviline is full of amazing power.

You see, Nerviline has the power—it's about five times stronger than ordinary remedies, and can penetrate very deeply. It contains juices and extracts of certain herbs that give it a strange power to drive out congestion, inflammation or pain.

You are safe in using Nerviline. Just rub it on—it won't blister or burn, and can do nothing but good.

Whenever there is pain or suffering Nerviline will go and will drive it out. It penetrates to every cell of a sore muscle; it sinks to the heart of every stiff sore joint; it searches out the pain of rheumatism quickly.

Give Nerviline a trial. See how fast it will limber your lame back, how quickly it will cure neuralgic headache, how fast it will break up a bad cold or ease a sore throat.

The best family pain-remedy ever made is Nerviline. Forty years of great success proves this.

For emergent ills, when the doctor isn't handy there is nothing better than the 50c family size bottle; trial size 25c., all dealers or the Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Canada.

Making Shot.

Even among sportsmen there are probably many people who are not acquainted with the manner in which shot is made. The process is carried out at what is known as a shot tower. This is a tall tower of metal or stone, with a tank at the top filled with molten lead. The bottom of this tank is perforated. This slide is pulled from side to side, and every time two holes come opposite each other a small quantity of molten lead falls through. As these drops fall through the air they assume a globular shape, and if the tower is of sufficient length they solidify before reaching the bottom. Here they fall into a tank of cold water and are cooled. When the shot is to be small the slide is worked more quickly than when it has to be larger.—Pearson's Weekly.

"I'm glad I'm not a goldfish," observed small Peter, "for in that case I'd have to stay in the bathtab all the time."

SICK HEADACHES PERMANENTLY CURED

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Correct the Cause of This Trouble.

There are few ailments that cause more genuine misery in the home than attacks which are generally termed sick headaches. The attacks are often periodical and when the mother of a family is prostrated at intervals there is not only her own suffering to consider, but the discomfort caused the other members of the household. Sick headaches arise from a variety of causes, and most of them can be relieved or cured through the tonic treatment with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Mrs. Hugh Docherty, Rocaville, Sask., says: "I suffered for years with what the doctors called nervous prostration and sick headache. When these spells came on I could not work nor walk, and the pains in my head were almost unbearable. At times the pain in my head was so dreadful that I feared it would drive me mad. I tried four different doctors at times, and not only took bottles of medicine, but quarts of it, but to no avail. Then I quit taking medicine altogether and tried dieting, but it made no difference. I was still an agonizing sufferer. Finally my husband urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and got me a supply. After taking the Pills for some weeks I felt a little better and I gladly continued their use. My nerves began to feel stronger, the terrible headache came with less frequency, and after taking the Pills for some months disappeared altogether. From that day to this I have had no return of the trouble, and all who knew of my illness regarded my cure as marvellous. I cannot say too much in praise of the Pills as they certainly saved me from a life of almost constant agony."

It is by building up and enriching the blood and strengthening the nerves that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills work seemingly marvellous cures, and what they have done for others they will do for all ailing people if given a fair trial. If you do not find these Pills at your medicine dealers you can get them by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

The Geranium.

For a maximum of beautiful flowers and a minimum of labor and expense, geraniums are unsurpassed. They are sure to be in bloom all winter if given ordinary care. The potted plants that have been under good treatment and that are well grown, strong and vigorous, are the ones to depend upon for winter blooming. It is quite a mistake that a season's growth and florescence impoverishes geraniums. The only consideration is to keep the roots well nourished, not to allow them to become pot bound, and to keep the foliage clean. Unless geraniums have sunlight, they will not bloom. They revel in sunshine, particularly the morning sun.

Rotation, by striking cuttings for new plants both spring and fall, must be kept up. Under the gentle heat and soft showers of spring geranium cuttings in damp sandy soil root quickly and grow like magic. The maiden bloom on a geranium but a few weeks old is sometimes phenomenal in size.

Discrimination is difficult among so many beautiful varieties. Almost each popular claimant has some special point of excellence. Scarlet geraniums are heroic; they command positions on blooming fields of long, hot summers.

White is, or should be, the motif in the color scheme of all flowers. Florists never fail to emphasize this fact in cut flower decorations and in the assortment of colors in the outdoor flower frieze. Two or three white or very light colored geraniums to one of any other color should be the rule.—Gardening, in Woman's World for February.

He Could Not Make One Step

THEN DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS CURED WALTER J. ROBERTS.

Newfoundland Man Finds a Firm Cure After Suffering Ten Months of Torture.—Doctors and Other Medicines Failed to Help Him.

Lewisport, Twillingate District, Nfld., March 8—(Special)—A thrilling story of a splendid cure by Dodd's Kidney Pills is told by Walter J. Roberts, a well-known resident of this place.

"My trouble started from a cold after measles," Mr. Roberts states. "For nineteen months I was confined to the house, and for ten months I could not make one step.

"I tried many doctors and medicines but got no relief from them. The trouble was in my feet, legs and arms, and at times was almost unbearable. I could not feed myself for those ten months.

"At last I tried Dodd's Kidney Pills, taking twenty-eight boxes in all, and am glad to say they made a firm cure of me."

"At last I tried Dodd's Kidney Pills, taking twenty-eight boxes in all, and am glad to say they made a firm cure of me."

Mr. Roberts' troubles were caused by diseased kidneys. That is why Dodd's Kidney Pills cured him. Diseased Kidneys fail in their duty of straining the impurities out of the blood and the consequence is trouble all over the body. Dodd's Kidney Pills cure diseased Kidneys.

THE POULTRY WORLD

POULTRY AND THE GARDEN.

No one who professes to keep poultry for profit can expect to be successful unless he makes a careful study of foods. Green feed is one of the essentials for healthy fowls and for satisfactory egg production, and the problem for getting the right kind of green food in reasonable quantities is easily solved if one has a garden.

Map out pretty definitely, early in the spring before the planting begins what is to be done in the course of the season. Keep in mind in the planning the relative positions of the henyard and garden. Have the henyard border on the ground so that the vegetables can be easily transferred.

Whether the garden pays or not in an incidental way depends largely on utilizing ground that is not needed for regular gardening, on the using of vegetables that would spoil, and on a little more than is likely to be used on the table. For example, Swiss chard will grow throughout the season; its leaves are tender and when broken off are quickly replaced by the growing plant. It is [illegible] a row of chard sowed in a drill fifty feet long will supply a small family with green feed. Even if no more chard can be planted than is needed for table use, it will be found that many of the leaves will become discolored, wormy, or tough, and would be a complete loss unless fed to poultry.

After lettuce and radishes have lost their first delicate flavor, give them to the chickens. The radishes themselves are seldom eaten, but the tops are greedily devoured. Lettuce is particularly well liked by chickens because of its tenderness. If the garden plot is large enough sow more lettuce than will be needed for table use and feed it daily to the hens or chickens until it is all gone. Frequently, too, in thinning out beets, those that are not wanted may be fed to poultry. Instead of doing the thinning all at one time, do it gradually, so that the poultry may consume it all without any waste. Late in the summer and in the autumn, give them cabbage leaves. Turnip seed sowed between August 1st and 15th will furnish tops that may be fed until the late frosts. Often cabbage or turnips may be planted in ground where early potatoes have been dug or string beans or late peas have been pulled up.

Ground that was planted to potatoes or corn may easily be prepared for rye, which is hardy and grows rapidly. It makes excellent green food until snow falls, during the winter thaws, and in the early spring before the grass grows.

The problem of getting green food for poultry in the winter is much more pressing than in summer. Mangel beets as well as cabbage may be easily grown and stored in the cellar, and should be cut into thin slices before given to hens. If cabbage is fed in too large quantities the eggs may partake of its flavor. Sweet corn that has become hard may be husked and put away for winter use.

Last year I was able to add to my winter food supply almost by accident. I was anxious to have a screen for my garden and I finally decided to plant sunflowers for an outer border. The seeds were planted about May 15th. By the middle of July the plants had grown so that the garden was a secluded spot. Before August 1st, they had grown to the height six or ten feet. The abundant crop of seeds which they bore was gathered and fed to the hens during the winter.—J. W. A., in The Garden Magazine.

FEEDING CHICKS.

No food of any sort should be given to chicks until they are forty-eight hours old. This is most imperative, for the yolk of the egg is absorbed into the abdomen just before the chicks breaks through the shell, and unless it is thoroughly digested and assimilated before other food is eaten, the digestive organism of the chick is upset. After the prescribed forty-eight hours, commercial chick-food—a mixture of small seeds, finely broken grains, put up especially for baby chicks—is the best food for the first ten days. Scatter a little at a time, upon the cut hay at the bottom of the brooder, four or five times a day, to encourage the chicks to scratch, and to take the exercise which is necessary for their health. Keep fine grit and charcoal always before them, and fresh water in vessels which the chicks can only get their bills into. After the first ten days, give a little mash night and morning, made by chopping a hard-boiled egg, shell and all, with green onion tops or sprouts. Mix with stale bread crumbs, and feed on a flat pie plate or strip of wood. After the chicks are two weeks old, the corn and oats need not be quite so fine—more the size of hempseed—and can be added to the mixture. Cracked wheat or barley can be added also; and the mash can be made of ground corn and oats, with onions and scalded liver, chopped, three times a week (about a small cupful to a quart of mash).—The Poultry Yard, in Woman's World for February.

NOTES.

Many poultry keepers do not realize the necessity of giving the fowls the green-stuff in winter. It should be remembered that green food is to fowls what fruit and vegetables are to us, correcting and toning the system. Cabbage is particularly valuable because it contains a large proportion of nitrogen and thus balances the carbon of grain foods.

Even though the weather should set in cold—and we may expect it to do so now—never shut your fowls up too closely at night. Give them plenty of ventilation, but see that they do not roost in a draught. Close, stuffy houses are a certain cause of colds, leading to bronchial complaints and roup. A canvas covering over the window of the house will afford ample protection even in the most severe weather.

Lime in some form is indispensable to laying hens, and most poultry-keepers provide it in the form of crushed oyster-shell. But this material, it should be borne in mind, is of no use to male birds or to hens that are not laying. It merely provides material for shell formation and does not perform, as many imagine, the function of flint grit. The latter is indispensable to fowls at all times to enable them to digest their food.

To readers interested in geese it may be of an advantage to know that old geese lay more, larger and more reliable eggs than young ones, that there is less risk in using young ganders than old geese for breeding and that the proportion of fertile eggs produced by a goose in the second year of laying is always greater than the first. It is also worth noting that geese which are moved about from place to place do not lay satisfactorily.

Macaroni prepared in any of the various ways in combination with cheese, butter and tomatoes is very nourishing.

To clean white vests, use block magnesia, rubbing it in well and freely. Put the vest in a drawer for several days; then beat and brush it.

To set colors in new cotton fabrics, dissolve one ounce of sugar of lead in eight quarts of water, and soak articles in it over night.

Mix a little vinegar with the stove polish, then the blacking will not fly off in fine dust, and will not take much rubbing to polish the stove. Polish it with old newspapers.

Slightly stale cake cut in fingers, toasted and spread with jam, makes a very acceptable dainty for afternoon tea.

Cream to whip nicely should be one day old.

To clean white buckskin and chamois shoes, try lump magnesia. Russet shoes can be cleaned by rubbing them with a banana peel, according to some.

Clean copper by rubbing it with lemon dipped in salt. Rinse in clear hot water and polish with a soft cloth.

A BILLION DOLLARS.

The Time It Would Take An Exper to Count Them Singly.

I wonder if we realize when we talk of a billion dollars what an enormous sum of money it means?

We all know how rapidly an expert counter of coins will manipulate them. You can scarcely follow the motion of his fingers as he shifts the coins from one pile to another and counts them. The treasury experts will count 4,000 silver dollars in an hour and keep it up all day, but that is their limit.

Working eight hours a day, then, an expert counter of coins will count 32,000 silver dollars in a day, but how long will it take him at that rate to count a million? Thirty-one days.

But that is only the beginning of the measurements of great figures, for if this same man were to go on counting silver dollars at the same rate of speed for ten years he would find that he had only counted 100,000,000 of them, and that to count $1,000,000,000 would require 102 years of steady work at the rate of eight hours a day during every working day of every one of the 102 years.—O. P. Austin, Former Chief of Bureau of Statistics.

Centipedes a Foot Long.

The giant centipede of Trinidad and Venezuela is sometimes a foot long, and can do very serious harm. Its foremost pair of feet are modified into supplementary jaws, which are fang-like, and may inflict a powerful bite; furthermore, each has a poison gland at its base, that sends into the wound a venom deadly to small creatures, and very painful even to mankind.

Moreover the sharp claw of each of the forty-two feet is poisonous likewise, so that when the animal crawls over the soft skin of the human arm, it leaves a trail of red, inflamed spots. It is dangerous to knock the centipede off, for instantly the creature drives the claws more deeply into the flesh, and sends a greater amount of venom into each puncture; it may also take hold with its jaws.

When the centipede seizes its prey, or is itself caught by an enemy, it coils itself round an antegolist, and grips it tenaciously with all its legs. Many myriapods are brightly banded with black and yellow, contrasting tints that show conspicuously against the dark soil of the forests where they abound. The giant centipede is a shining mahogany brown, with the legs bluish and ringed with yellow.—Youth's Companion.

A Composite Product.

Mrs. Boggs—Mr. Meekman is a splendid example of what a man ought to be. Mr. Boggs—Not on your life! He's a splendid example of what a wife, two sisters, a grown up daughter and a mother-in-law think a man ought to be.—Puck.

Carrying the Baby.

Even though parental love may be strong within him the average man has an aversion to carrying a baby in public. It is not because the task is too laborious, but it seems that the ordinary man was not intended to do this duty.

Man's aversion to shouldering a baby in public can probably be traced to his shyness. He dislikes to enter a public place or conveyance with a baby because he is aware that the eyes of those present will be turned in the baby's direction, and when they have feasted on the baby to their satisfaction they will turn to him. If the baby is pretty and the man fails to measure up to the same standard the gossips present set their tongues to wagging, and the man is criticised until he becomes embarrassed and grows red.

His every act is scanned and commented on. "He does not know how to carry the baby." "Can that be that baby's father?" "Say, if he looked anything like that baby when he was young he must have lost all his good looks."

Just as he is in the midst of his embarrassment the baby reaches for his tie and yanks it out from beneath his coat. Perhaps the baby will feel the man's whiskers or do some little act like that which would discourage any man and force him to raise his right hand and swear, "Never again!"

For You—a wonderful Book on Farm Drainage—FREE!

Do you know you can take as much crop off 100 acres properly drained as you can off 200 acres not drained and save half the labor? It's a fact. Do you know that proper, inexpensive tile drainage assists pulverization—lengthens the season—prevents surface washing—makes your land lighter to work—prevents drought and increases the quantity and improves the quality of your crops?

Why not have us send you, today, free of charge, a very interesting booklet on this subject? Much to learn—nothing to pay. Don't neglect anything that will help you grow better, bigger crops. Proper drainage means as much as two dollars in your bank account for every one that goes there now, and the Goverment lends you money for the Tile if desired.

No Fixed Programmes.

The map found on a captured Uhlan marked with the prearranged marches of the German troops reminds one that Wellington distrusted fixed plans of campaign. Asked on one occasion how he managed to capture Napoleon's marshals one after the other, he replied: "They planned their campaigns just as you might make a splendid set of harness. It looks very well, it answers very well, until it gets broken, and them you're done for. Now, I make my campaigns of ropes. If anything went wrong, I tied a knot and went on."

CEREAL CROPS

Cereal production has occupied an important position in the work of the Experimental Farms since their inception some twenty-eight years ago. By selection, the best varieties of grains for Canadian conditions have been brought to light and by breeding many important sorts have been produced. Pioneer wheat, a new early sort possessing many merits gives promise of filling an important place in northern sections. The results in 1914 with this and other sorts of wheat, as well as oats and barley at the Central Farm and sixteen branch farms and stations and two sub-stations are presented in bulletin No. 81 of the Experimental farm series. This seasonable pamphlet is available at the Publications branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.

GOOD PROFITS

In one dairy record centre maintained by the dairy division, Ottawa in 1914 there were such surprising contrasts in yields of milk and fat that they must command the attention of every progressive dairyman.

The best cow in one herd gave only 4158 pounds of milk and only 155 pounds of fat; the average of the whole herd was only 3772 lbs of milk and 136 pounds of fat. In a herd [illegible] the [illegible] yield [illegible] was 5658 pounds [illegible] and 278 [illegible] the [illegible] average was 7235 pounds of milk and 342 pounds of fat.

There were several individual yields of over eight thousand pounds of milk, while one good grade cow gave 14400 pounds of milk and 562 pounds of fat.

Coming to the cost of feed, plenty of herds had an average cost per cow of from forty to forty-five dollars; even at these high figures the profit above the cost of feed ran up to forty-six and fifty dollars as the herd average.

Such results are full of encouragement for the owners, and augur well for the future of cow testing in the Maritime Provinces. Other dairymen may well strive to emulate these records of fifty and sixty-five dollars clear profit above the cost of feed as made by good individual cows. This sensible method of determining the respective merit of each cow as a profit maker lays a solid foundation for building up a singularly interesting herd from a modern business standpoint.

PATRIOTISM and PRODUCTION

"I would urge the farmers of Canada to do their share in preventing the people of Great Britain from suffering want or privation."
HON. MARTIN BURRELL, Minister of Agriculture.

The Empire Needs Many Foods

In the past Great Britain has imported immense quantities of these staple foods from Russia, France, Belgium, Germany and Austria-Hungary as shown by the following:—

Average Imports
Years 1910-1913

Wheat	28,439,609	bush.
Oats	23,686,301	"
Barley	15,192,268	"
Corn	7,621,374	"
Peas	703,058	"
Beans	639,663	"
Potatoes	4,721,590	"
Onions	271,569	"
Meat	25,609,766	lbs.
Eggs	121,112,916	doz.
Butter and Cheese	91,766,233	lbs.

The above mentioned sources of supply of staple foods are now, in the main, cut off as a result of the war. Great Britain is looking to Canada to supply a large share of the shortage. Every individual farmer has a duty to perform.

Millions of bushels rather than millions of acres should be Canada's aim.

That there is abundant reason to expect larger returns from the same area is conclusively shown when we compare the average production of the present time with the possible production. Note the following brief table which shows the average in 1914 and possible production per acre.

	Average	Possible
Fall Wheat	20.43	63.
Spring Wheat	14.84	33.
Barley	16.16	69.
Oats	36.30	91.
Corn, Grain	70.	200.
Corn Ensilage (Tons)	12.	15.
Peas	15.33	37.
Beans	18.73	50.
Potatoes	119.40	450.
Turnips	421.81	1000.

By "possible" is meant the actual results which have been obtained by our Experimental Farms and by many farmers. These "possibles" have been obtained under intensive cultivation methods and conditions not altogether possible on the average farm, yet they suggest the great possibilities of increased production. By greater care in the selection of seed, more thorough cultivation, fertilization, better drainage, the average could be raised by at least one-third. That in itself would add at least $150,000,000 to the annual income of Canada from the farm. It would be a great service to the Empire, and this is the year in which to do it.

Increase Your Live Stock

Breeding stock are to-day Canada's most valuable asset. The one outstanding feature of the world's farming is that there will soon be a great shortage of meat supplies. Save your breeding stock. Plan to increase your live stock. Europe and the United States, as well as Canada, will pay higher prices for beef, mutton, and bacon in the very near future. Do not sacrifice now. Remember that live stock is the only basis for prosperous agriculture. You are farming, not speculating.

TURKEY

The Turkish or Ottoman Empire comprises Turkey in Europe and Turkey in Asia. Other regions are nominally under the Sultan's suzerainty. Until the time that Turkey entered into the present war, Egypt was among the number.

The population of the Empire was given in 1910 as over 36,000,000. In the provinces directly under Turkish government there were at that time 26,000,000. The Turks are estimated to number some 10 millions of whom 1½ millions are in Europe. Other races represented are, Arabs, Jews, Syrians, Slavs, Greeks, Albanians and Kurds.

The mainstay of the Ottoman dynasty is the Asiatic portion of the Empire where the Mohammedan religion is absolutely predominant. In Asia Minor the naturally vigorous and robust Turkish race forms a compact mass of many millions.

The leading items of import are, sugar, rice, flour, American cloth, cotton thread, cotton print, woollen fabric coffee and petroleum. Total value of imports in 1909, $135,000,000.

The chief exports are barley, opium, grapes, figs, sheep and goat skins, carpets, and silk. Total value of exports, 1909 $80,000,000.

LICENTIOUS LITERATURE

Most people laying claim to respectability look upon the filth with a measure of abhorrence. It is bad enough when spoken, but worse when it appears in cold type. Some thrive on anything obscene or vulgar but these are only of the lower class, and will never rise to positions of respectable influence. We occasionally see a copy of publication in circulation here and elsewhere. That it contains some good and well written articles along certain lines we are not going to deny. This is a commendable feature and we call out for the intermingling of highly [illegible] approval by our better class of readers. The suggestiveness and even more, of a depraved imagination on the part of the contributors is enough to condemn the publication in question and bar it from legitimate sale as a literary production. It isn't fit so far as we have examined, to have a place in our homes where it cannot fail to corrupt the manners and morals of our young and rising generation. How older people laying claim to good morals can tolerate and assist in the circulation of such a class of literature taking the good and decidedly bad together is something we can scarcely understand. If we dared to put in a tithe of the filth in the Chronicle, we would soon be deserted by the better class of readers and justly so.—Durham Chronicle.

Temperance People Disappointed.

It is but natural that the delegates to the Dominion Alliance, who, in an enormous deputation, interviewed Premier Hearst and his Government at the Parliament Buildings on Friday, March 5th, should feel disappointed with the Government's attitude. The Prime Minister, of course, was non-committal and did not say definitely what he would do or what he would not do but the tenor of his remarks revealed the fact that he was not likely to grant what the deputation asked for, which was the complete prohibition of the sale of liquor in Ontario, if not for all time, for the very least during the course of the present war.

"The zig-zag path is often the best" was one of the disappointing remarks made by Mr. Hearst, showing an admitted lack of directness in his desire to deal with the request of the deputation. As if this remark was not enough, the Prime Minister emphasized it still further by saying that "a frontal attack is not always the best."

Hon. Mr. Hanna was equally disappointing to the temperance people. The furthest he would go was to say that they would not find this Government behind the previous Government in its dealings with the liquor traffic. What the temperance people asked for of course, was a policy much in advance of that given by the Government of Mr James Whitney on this particular point.

Mr. F. S. Spence, in speaking in support of the deputation's views, told the Premier that he held office today thanks to the votes of a large number of Conservatives who believed that if the Conservative party were returned it would change its policy on the temperance question and advance rather than stand still. "Now is Mr. Hearst's opportunity," said Mr Spence, "to let the temperance-Conservatives see if they were right or not."

Ex-Mayor Lees of Hamilton, in supporting the demand for the total prohibition of the sale of liquor in the Province, said that he and his family were Conservatives and always voted Conservatives when they had a chance but did not do so when they felt the Government was opposed to advance temperance measures.

At the concluding session of the Dominion Alliance conference, Mr. N. W. Rowell acted as Chairman.

Effective, specific instances of the extravagance of the present Ontario Government were given by Joseph Ham, Liberal member for South Brant, in the course of his maiden speech.

"The men," he prefaced his remarks by saying, "who were entrusted with the responsibility of handling the Provincial finances during the years when money was plentiful, did not see to it that a full dollar's worth of value was obtained for every dollar expended. They did not, like wise business men, lay a little aside every year for a time of stress. The result to-day is an empty Treasury and a deficit. At the very time when the people of Ontario are hard enough pressed for money even as it is, the Government levies an extra tax upon them. I am as anxious as anyone that the Allies should receive the fullest support from Ontario, but if the Government had administered the finances of the Province in a careful way, it would have had sufficient money to-day to make all necessary grants without levying this special tax of one mill on the dollar.

The three items of expenditure especially objected to by Mr. Ham were (1) The cost of Civil Government (2) The cost of the Prison Farm at Guelph, especially the cow stables, and (3) The cost of Government House.

ST. JEAN DE MATHA, JAN. 27th, 1914.

"After suffering for a long time with Dyspepsia, I have been cured by "Fruit-a-tives". I suffered so much that I would not dare eat for I was afraid of dying. Five years ago, I received samples of "Fruit-a-tives". I did not wish to try them for I had little confidence in them but, seeing my husband's anxiety, I decided to do so and at once I felt relief. Then I sent for three boxes and I kept improving until I was cured. While sick, I lost several pounds, but after taking "Fruit-a-tives", I quickly regained what I had lost. Now I eat, sleep and digest well—in a word, I am completely cured, thanks to "Fruit-a-tives".

Memoriam

In loving memory of Mrs. Katherine Berscht who died on January 6th, 1915.

Resting with Jesus, sweetly,
Away from the toil and care,
She has reached the many mansions,
And is resting at His feet;
The path was sometimes rugged,
And the way seemed sometimes long,
But she shortened the way with labor,
And cheered the path with song.

Homeward Jesus called to the land of light,
Heavenward now the glory has burst upon her sight,
All the dark behind her, all the bright before,
In the golden sunlight, of the heavenly shore.
So we must not grieve so sorely
For she loves us dearly still,
Pray to look beyond earth's shadows,
Pray to trust our Fathers will,
There is work still waiting for us,
So we must not idly stand,
Do it now while life remaineth,
We shall rest in Jesus land
When that work is all completed
He will gently call us home,
On the rapture of that meeting,
When our Mother see's us come.

Brant Township Farms

I have, in Brant, 2 fifty acre farms, 1 forty-six acre farm, 1 one hundred and thirty acre farm, 2 two hundred acre farms all WELL IMPROVED, convenient to Hanover or Walkerton, and the owners have placed them in my hands because they ARE BOUND TO SELL. I have also a 100 acre farm in Perth, near Listowel, one of the best farms in the County of Perth, with extra improvements, a very great bargain at $7000. I never before had such a choice of Farms as now. My office is HEADQUARTERS and you should come to see me if you want to buy at right prices.

Deal At Home.

Some forty sacks of catalogues for a Toronto departmental store were sent out from the post-office last week. Look them over and then see if the local merchants can't do as well for you. The local merchants advt. in the Telescope should help you some. Every dollar sent away from town means a loss to the town and every resident of it.

Attended Funeral.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm Little and a large number of relatives attended the funeral of the late Mrs. Andrew Weir in Walkerton on Tuesday. Mrs. Weir, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Little was in her seventy ninth year and had resided in Brant township for nearly forty years. About a year ago she suffered a slight stroke which caused her to lose her power of speech. She died on Saturday. She was the sixth member of a family of eleven, four of whom still survive, Mr. Wm Little and Mrs. Alex McDonald of town, Robert of Kansas and Archibald of Manitoba.—Teeswater News.

Fake Advertising.

Fake advertising is passing into the discard where it belongs. The Indiana legislature has passed a drastic law making the penalty a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500 for misrepresentation in any way. This applies to newspaper, bill boards and other types of advertising.

Stopping Shoe Squeak.

The "squeak" in shoes is caused by the inside and outside soles rubbing together in walking. To overcome this disagreeable trouble make an opening at the edge of the inside of the shank of the shoe, and work a screw-driver between the soles to the tips, thereby loosening the inner and outer soles. Then work in a little French chalk, soapstone or talcum powder through the opening. By bending the soles back and forth, or slightly tapping the edges, the powder will work itself between them. The opening can then be closed with one or two tacks, and the squeaking will be permanently stopped. Such an emergency repair is very much better than the soaking and oiling frequently resorted to, and yet does no harm to the shoes provided the job is done by a competent shoe repairer.

Shooting Accident.

On Saturday, the 27th. of February, a fatal shooting accident occurred shortly after 1 o'clock which resulted in the death of Edwin Kennedy, aged 17 years. Deceased was the only son of Mr and Mrs. Hugh Kennedy, Mechanic's Ave. Edwin Kennedy accompanied by his chum Albert Wilson, started out to have an afternoon's hunt, going out by way of the Durham road. At the iron bridge Albert Wilson tried to load his gun. He was unable to do it, owing to the spring to draw the shell off being too week to force the pin back into position. Edwin Kennedy, who was well acquainted with the mechanism of a gun took the gun from Wilson and cocking it, broke it and pushed the little pin back into position with his knife blade. This permitted him to load the gun, which he did. He then handed it back to Wilson. It is presumed that he left the gun cocked. The boys entered the hollow on the south side of the creek. They proceeded up it for some distance and going to the north side were walking along side by side on a level piece of ground, just below the blind road near Fitzgerald's on the Saugeen. It was here the accident occured. Just how it happened is not known. Albert Wilson believes he went to shift the gun up a little, on his arm. He had on a pair of gloves. In shifting the gun he must have touched the trigger and went off. The charge entered Edwin's right leg from the back, just above the knee, coming out at the front. Wilson tried to stop the wound by tying his handkerchief around it as tight as he could, and he then ran to Fitzgeralds for assistance. Mr. Hugeland happened along and the wounded boy was at once put into his sleigh and driven to his home. Medical aid was summoned and it was found necessary to amputate the limb. The shock and loss of blood proving too much for the boy and he passed away at nine o'clock Saturday night. Edwin Kennedy was a boy of bright disposition, and well liked by his companions. The parents will have the deepest sympathy of all in their sad and sudden bereavements. Albert Wilson, his chum is heart-broken over the sad occuance. He is used to a gun, and a careful lad. An inquest is being held into the accident. The jury was empanneled on Monday and after a brief enquiry into the case the inquest was adjourned until Friday next. The funeral of the unfortunate boy took place on Tuesday. The remains were taken to Lovat for buriel. A ceremony was held at the house on Monday evening which was largely attended.— Kincardine Reporter.

Player Given Strychnine.

Following the Listowel Harriston hockey match Monday night rumors were current locally that certain of the visiting aggregation who had been given strychnine as a stimulant, had taken convulsions on the homeward trip and were in a serious condition, necessitating the confinement of one player in Palmerston en route. The Banner endeavored to carefully investigate the story and found that J. Hastie, who played right wing for the visiting aggregation, was in a serious condition, necessitating the delay of the special train at Palmerston, but that he has since quite recovered. Miss McGee of the Palmerston hospital informed The Banner by 'phone however, that none of the players had been in the hospital.—Listowel Banner.

COMMUNICATION

To the Editor of the Telescope.

Dear Sir:

We have heard a great deal lately about the "Made in Canada" campaign but I fail to see why we should buy goods that are inferior in order to show our patriotism.

For example take some of the brands of matches that are made in Canada today. I think a great many will agree with me in saying that there is room for improvement and then some. It may be a test of patriotism to turn our faces against our own countrymen, but I think they should try and excell if possible the foreign standard. If they did this we would have no excuse for buying goods with the foreign label. The standard would be put against them as a test and the injury done them by their own people buying the better goods would only be a lesson to them to make goods as excellent. I believe there will come a time when no one will ask, "Was this made in Canada" or "Was this made in the United States?" and so on. They will only ask themselves, "Is this good"? Is it the best? And the question as to whether it was made in certain geographical boundaries will only be a secondary consideration. In short, to be brief, I do not believe in labels. I think every tub should stand on its own bottom or go to smithereens.

Yours truly,
A Brant Farmer.

Application To Parliament.

Notice is hereby given that an application will be made by the Corporation of the town of Walkerton to the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario at the next ensuing session thereof for an act to consolidate the outstanding debenture and other indebtedness of the said town at the rate of $41,000, and authorizing and empowering the Corporation to raise by way of loan the said sum of $41,000 on the credit of its debentures to be issued under the authority of the said act.

That the said debentures shall be payable within thirty years after the issue thereof and shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent per annum as the said council shall determine. The existing debenture debt of the said town of Walkerton is as follows: and no portion thereof is in arrears:—

Former consolidated debt	$ [illegible] 79
Sewers	1907 11
Waterworks	13786 08
General improvement	7510 29
Bonus loans	1898 38
Public Library	1812 10
Floating debt	1821 30
	$41000 00

The reason for requiring the consolidation of the said debenture debt and for the issue of such debentures is to enable a reduction to be made in the sums to be raised annually for the repayment of the said debt and to enable the Corporation to pay off its floating indebtedness, which was incurred in executing works of a permanent and necessary character.

The History of the County of Bruce
And of The
Minor Municipalities Therein
(BY NORMAN ROBERTSON)
Forty Illustrations, Sixteen Maps, Five Hundred and Sixty Pages.

The above volume covers the history of the county from the days when it was the hunting grounds of the Indians to November 1906. It has eleven chapters devoted to the county as a whole, followed by twenty-seven chapters, each of which takes up the history of one of the towns, townships or villages. Accompanying the chapter on each township is a map of it, clearly showing each farmlot therein.

In addition to being an historical narrative, in this work there are to be found many personal incidents relating to scores of prominent men in all parts of the county.

A number of historical documents have been collected and are printed in the appendix, along with a large amount of statistical information, both of which are important to have preserved. The edition is a limited one.

TRUE TO HIS RACE

He closed and sealed these letters, and rang for a late waiter, into whose hands he placed them, with the order that they should go by the first mail.

And then, having done all that it was possible to do in the premises that night, he retired to rest.

The next morning the Earl of Wellrose, Captain Douglas and Dr. Kinlock left Southampton for London by an early train. A double compartment in a first-class carriage had been engaged and fitted up comfortably with additional cushions and rugs. So the journey was accomplished with more ease to the invalid officer than could have been hoped from his weakened condition.

On reaching London they took rooms at the nearest hotel, the Paddington, where they passed the remainder of the day and the night.

The next morning, with precautions for Captain Douglas' comfort, the party started by the Great Northwestern train for York, en route for Scotland.

They reached that old cathedral town in the afternoon, rested there until the next morning, and then resumed their journey. The afternoon of the third day brought them into Edinburgh. And thus, by short and easy stages, they in turn reached Glasgow, Stirling, Callender and finally, on the evening of the fourth day they reached by coach the little port of Kilford, where the steamer Sprite was waiting Lord Wellrose's orders to take them up the loch to Seton Castle.

Immediately on leaving the coach the party went on board the steamer.

It was a cold, clear, starlight night, and to Benjamin, who sat on deck, wrapped in his old camp coat, the majestic scenery of loch and mountain was but dimly apparent, but the very obscurity of the landscape lent the weird charm of awe to its beauty. They passed the narrow, winding "straits" that connected the sea with the loch, and where the turns were so short that every few minutes it seemed as if the bows of the boat were going straight up to the land. At length a final turn brought them out upon the broad expanse of the loch, encircled by its lofty mountains, now looming dimly through the clear, starlight night.

Benny uttered a low exclamation of delight.

"You should see the loch by daylight, or by moonlight, when, indeed, it is exceedingly beautiful," said the earl.

"It is beautiful exceedingly now, under the dim light of the stars," answered Benjamin, in a low, hushed tone.

And then the brothers relapsed into that silence which is more eloquent than words, as they gazed upon the darkly glorious scene.

A few minutes more brought them to the foot of the water stairs leading from the loch up into the wooded hills of Seton Castle.

Lord Wellrose gave his arm to his brother, and supported him in going up the stairs, at the top of which they found a large and commodious closed carriage waiting to take the travelers to the house.

They drove up a winding road through the thick woods, to the top of the hill, where they entered an avenue of oak trees that presently led them up to the front of the house, where the windows were shining with hospitable lights.

Mrs. Bruce, the aged housekeeper, with the household servants at her back, received the party at the door. She had been the earl's nurse a quarter of a century back, and this circumstance constituted a bond of strong affection between herself and her foster-child. She had been promoted from the nursery to the head of the house at Seton Court, and was passing her old age in ease and comfort.

She now stood there in the lighted hall, looking trim and neat in her black silk dress and white muslin cap, neckerchief and apron, smiling and courtesying her welcome.

"How do you do, Mrs. Bruce?" said the young earl, affectionately, shaking her hands and kissing her rough cheeks.

"I'm weel and blithe to see ye, my bairn—my laird, I mean!" replied the old nurse, suddenly correcting herself.

"Your 'bairn,' always, dear nurse! Whatever I may be to others, I am your 'bairn,'" said the young earl, with his kindly smile. "And now here is my kinsman, Captain Douglas, who has come back from the wars wounded and ill, and in need of tender and skillful nursing. You must take as much care of him as you used to take of me when I was ailing," he added.

"Ah! God bless his bonny face! he's unco like the family, and might be your lordship's ain brither, by the looks of him. But eh, sirs! he's unco fair and fragile to hae been a sodger, too. Aweel, laddie, the guid mountain air, wi' my nursin, will sune bring ye round again," she said, nodding and courtesying to the invalid guest, who smiled and thanked her.

There were spacious, comfortably furnished, old-fashioned bedrooms, lighted with wax candles in tall silver candlesticks, and heated with glowing wood fires in the massive open fireplaces, waiting for the travelers. Here they refreshed themselves with a wash, and then went down to the smaller dining room, where a good supper was ready for them.

Soon after supper they went to bed.

In the morning Benny arose early, and with the assistance of a footman whom Lord Wellrose had appointed to wait on him, he made his toilet, and went to the morning parlor, to which the footman showed the way.

This parlor had a modern French window opening upon a balcony, and overlooking the loch.
